But if it were necessary to the validity of the bequests here in question to hold that the legatee should have corporate capacity, I should be inclined to hold that the act of Parliament before referred to was sufficient for that purpose. It expressly provides the machinery by which the society may acquire and hold for its purposes real and personal property, and it impliedly, at least, authorizes such acquisition and holding, and subjects it to the purposes of the society as declared by its governing body. The same act authorizes the grantee of this power to unite with any other church, religious body, or association in Ireland, but says nothing of the effect of such union upon the exercise of the power thus granted. I conclude that the effect would not be to destroy the power, but rather that it would be perpetuated in the association to re-legacy. Wright v. Methodist Episcopal Church, Hoffm. Ch. 239. This case contains a very full and valuable examination of the jurisdiction of chancery to enforce charitable trusts.

Bequests for charitable purposes to unincorporated societies are sustained where the object is competent and is designated or may be clearly ascertained. Hornbeck v. American Bible Soc. 2 Sandf. Ch. 133.

A bequest to an unincorporated religious association for the use of its poor ministers is not within the statute against perpetuities. Shotwell v. Mott, 2 Sandf. Ch. 46.

A bequest to a religious society as such is valid as a gift for pious and charitable uses, although the society is not incorporated. Banks v. Phelan, 4 Barb. 80.

Such a bequest is void as there is no trustee competent to take the fund, since a society is composed of fluctuating and unascertained persons, and the beneficiaries are the entire community within the influence of the society. Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 366, 80 Am. Dec. 290; Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 238.

But it was subsequently held that a bequest to a voluntary association is invalid. Owens v. Missionary Soc. of M. E. Ch. 14 N. Y. 380, 67 Am. Dec. 160. The reason given was that, the purpose of the gift not being stated, there was no way of ascertaining the object to which it should be devoted. But it is said that it is not intended to deny the power of courts of equity to enforce the execution of trusts created for charitable purposes in cases where the fund is given to trustees competent to take, and where the use is so far defined as to be capable of being specifically executed by authority of law.

A voluntary unincorporated association is not legally competent to receive a donation, even for a purpose denominated charitable. Sherwood v. American Bible Soc. 1 Keyes, 561, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 227.

So that the generally recognized rule in that state now is that a bequest to an unincorporated association or society is void. First Presby. Soc. v. Bowen, 21 Hun, 389; McKeon v. Kearney, 57 How. Pr. 349; Betts v. Betts, 4 Abb. N. C. 403; Leonard v. Davenport, 58 How. Pr. 384. But in a recent case in the surrogate's court it was held that an unincorporated association was competent to take a bequest for a pious use. Carpenter v. Historical Soc. 1 Dem. 607. And in De Witt v. Chandler, 11 Abb. Pr. 471, a bequest to an unincorporated society is upheld without a direct discussion upon the question under the act authorizing the suit for the benefit of associations consisting of seven or more members.

So other states have followed the same rule.

A bequest to an unincorporated association is not valid for want of capacity in the legatees to take and enjoy what is given. Holland v. Peck, 2 Ired. Eq. 255.

A bequest directly to an unincorporated association is void. Rhodes v. Rhodes, 88 Tenn. 637.

A gift to an unincorporated association to be put into the hands of a trustee to be selected by it is void. Daniel v. Fain, 5 Lea, 319; Reeves v. Reeves, Id. 644.

A bequest to an unincorporated society is void. White v. Hale, 2 Coldw. 77.

A bequest to a voluntary unincorporated association is void because it is incapable of taking title to property and there is no cestui que trust who can enforce its execution in equity. Church Extension of M. E. Ch. v. Smith, 56 Md. 362; Rizer v. Perry, 58 Md. 113.

By the laws of Maryland a bequest to an unincorporated society of a fund to be applied by it to a certain purpose is void. Meade v. Beale, Taney, 339.

sult from the union. The result would be that the trustees previously appointed by the Wesleyan Methodist Society would, by the union, acquire the rights and be subjected to the duties and restrictions prescribed in the act.

The character and objects of the legatees are beyond question. It is a matter of history and general knowledge, of which the court takes notice without proof, that the societies formed by Wesley in the British Isles and in this country were, and still continue to be, societies engaged in promoting the Christian religion, and therefore charitable. Money given to any such society is presumably given to charity, and the gift will be upheld. I will advise that the gifts are valid; that the fund set apart for the annuity of $50 may be paid to the "stewards," for the time being, of the Belturbet circuit, and the residue to be paid to the permanent trustees of the general society or conference for Ireland. Such payment may be made under the supervision of a special master, and upon such vouchers as he may approve; and upon his report a decree may be made discharging the executor. Costs of both parties with a reasonable counsel fee to be fixed, will be paid out of the fund.

A mere change in the form of indebtedness will not discharge a lien unless the parties clearly intend to extinguish it.

Cansler v. Sallis, 54 Miss. 446.

At the time Patty made this loan to Hill his own security was valid although the trust deed was not signed by Mrs. Hill (the debt being for the purchase money). Owing to the relation of the parties, Patty, being the agent of Mrs. Jeffries, having the exclusive lending of her money and taking security therefor, could not, under such circumstances, take an invalid security for her in any transaction in which he was personally interested where he would be deriving any benefit. Hill, knowing this relation and knowing that the real purpose in this new trust deed was to allow Patty to use that much of Mrs. Jeffries' money, was equally bound with Patty, and so far as the property was concerned it should in equity remain in the same way it was when this illegal transaction took place.

Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1211, 1212, and cases therein cited.

Messrs. Orr & Dinsmore for appellee.

Cooper, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, as administrator of the estate of Mrs. Frances A. Jeffries, exhibited his bill against the appellees, asking to be subrogated to the security of a certain deed of trust executed by the appellee Hill, on the 18th day of January, 1889, to secure the payment of a debt of $450 and interest thereon, in such deed described, to one R. C. Patty. On final hearing this relief was denied, and the complainant appeals.

The facts, chronologically stated, are as follows: In the year 1885 Patty sold to Hill a small tract of land at the price of $450, for which he accepted the notes of Hill, payable at stated future times. On the 18th of January, 1889, Hill, not having paid any part of the purchase price of said land, executed a deed of trust to Patty to secure the same. On the same day Patty, acting as the agent of one Mrs. Gaston, loaned to Hill the sum of $264, and received from him to secure its payment a deed of trust on certain personal property. On the 1st day of January, 1890, Patty had in his hands as the agent of Mrs. Jeffries, a sum of money which she had intrusted to him to lend, or otherwise invest, for her account.

NOTE.—As to subrogation to rights under a mortgage which has been paid, see Wilton v. Mayberry (Wis.) 6 L. R. A. 61; Lowe v. Rawlins (Ga.) 6 L. R. A. 73; Dutcher v. Hobby (Ga.) 10 L. R. A. 472; Campbell v. Foster Home Asso. (Pa.) 26 L. R. A. 117; Stewart v. Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. (Ohio) 29 L. R. A. 438, and Union Mortgage Bkg. & T. Co. v. Peters (Miss.) 30 L. R. A. 829.

Hill had paid no part of the purchase price of the land, and not much of the amount due by him to Mrs. Gaston, and she desired to have the balance due her paid by him. Patty, acting for himself and Mrs. Gaston and Mrs. Jeffries, accepted from Hill his note for $650, payable to Mrs. Jeffries, in payment of the debt owing to him for the purchase money of the land, and in payment of the balance due to Mrs. Gaston. He delivered up to Hill the notes by which these debts were evidenced, and canceled the deeds of trust by which said notes had been secured, and accepted from Hill a deed of trust, upon the land and personalty, to secure the note then executed by him to Mrs. Jeffries. This note and deed Patty retained in his possession until his death, which occurred in December, 1890. Mrs. Jeffries died in August, 1890, not having been advised by Patty of the fact that he had made the investment of her money. After the death of Patty, the note and deed of trust were delivered by his representative to the administrator of Mrs. Jeffries. Hill had made some small payments to Patty on the note, and also paid two or three small sums to the administrator of Mrs. Jeffries. It was then discovered that the wife of Hill had not joined in the deed securing the note to Mrs. Jeffries, by reason of which, since a part of the land was a homestead, the security, as to it, was invalid, under our statute requiring the wife to join in the conveyance of the homestead. Hill, it appears, thereupon promised to procure his wife to join him in the execution of a new deed of trust, but afterwards refused to do so, and the appellant exhibited his bill, setting up the facts, and praying that the deed of trust executed by Hill to Patty on the 18th of January, 1889, be reinstated and enforced. On final hearing it was agreed that the sum due by Hill was $500, for which the court rendered a final personal decree against him, and directed the land, in excess of the homestead exemption, to be sold for its payment, and, on the cross bill of Hill, decreed cancelation of the deed as to the land composing the homestead.

It is said by counsel that the chancellor was controlled in his decision by the case of Howell v. Bush, 54 Miss. 437. In that case Howell, who owned an encumbered homestead, borrowed the money from Bush to pay off the debt, agreeing to give, as security, a deed of trust on the property. This deed he executed, but there, as here, the wife did not join in the deed, and Bush sought subrogation to the rights of the encumbrancer, whose debt the money he loaned had paid. The court held that, since Bush had carved out and selected his own security, and had canceled, and intended to cancel, the original encumbrance, and since neither fraud nor mistake of fact was alleged or proved, the original encumbrance could not be revived for his protection. If Mrs. Jeffries had loaned the money to Hill, and taken the invalid security, the case of Howell v. Bush would have controlled. The reason of that case, however, was that the lender had carved out his own security, which failed of effect because of a mistake of law. It does not decide that there can be no subrogation, in any event, to a security which was discharged, and intended to be discharged, by the parties. We need not again examine this question, as it is fully discussed in the opinion of the court, and in the dissenting opinion of Judge Whitfield, in Union Mortgage, Bkg. & T. Co. v. Peters, 72 Miss. 1058, 30 L. R. A. 829. Starting with the proposition that, under circumstances, a security, though once intentionally canceled, may be revived and enforced by a court of equity, the single inquiry is whether the facts of this case bring the complainant within the principle on which relief will be granted. In the administration of relief by subrogation, it will be found that the jurisdiction of equity rests largely upon the prevention of frauds and relief against mistakes; and the expansion of the rule has so nearly covered the field that it may now be said that, wherever a court of equity will relieve against a transaction, it will do so by the remedy of subrogation, if that be the most efficient and complete that can be afforded. We are of the opinion that the complainant was, and is, entitled to the relief prayed in this cause, for the reason that the arrangement made between Patty, the agent of Mrs. Jeffries, and the defendant, was one which Patty had no right to make, and because the defendant, by the very nature of the transaction, was bound to know, and did know, that the agent was, while professing to act for Mrs. Jeffries, directly interested in the negotiation, and could therefore only bind his principal by her consent, she being fully informed of what he was doing or had done. We need not cite authorities for the proposition that the agent must be loyal to his principal, and, like all other fiduciaries, is forbidden to make a profit by a breach of trust. An agent employed to sell cannot be a buyer, nor one employed to buy be a seller, in the matters intrusted to him by his principal. Wharton, Agency, §§ 232, 239, 594, 760. "When an agent, without knowledge of his principal, becomes engaged in an adverse interest, he is guilty of a gross breach of trust, making himself personally liable to his principal for the damage, and vitiating, . . . at the principal's election, any contract made under the influence of such disloyal engagements. And this rule obtains even where the agent reaps no benefit from the transaction." Id. § 244; Baughn v. Shackleford, 48 Miss. 255. In Ex parte James, 8 Ves. Jr. 337, Lord Eldon said that "this doctrine as to purchases by trustees, assignees, and persons having a confidential character, stands much more upon general principle than upon the circumstances of any individual case. It rests upon this: That the purchase is not permitted in any case, however honest the circumstances, the general interests of justice requiring it to be destroyed in every instance; as no court is equal to the examination and ascertainment of the truth in much the greater number of cases."

The fact is apparent that, in making the loan to Hill, Patty, the agent, was acting in a matter in which his interests were adverse to those of Mrs. Jeffries. He had sold the land to Hill years before, and no part of the purchase price had been paid. It is not unreasonable to assume that it was not, to him, a desirable investment of his own funds, and that he took advantage of the opportunity, afforded by the circumstances of having Mrs. Jeffries' money in his hands, to transfer his claim against a slow debtor to his principal. Whether this be true, however, is immaterial, for Mrs. Jeffries was entitled to the exercise of his judgment, uninfluenced by his personal interests, in making loans of her money, and this she did not have. Whether the investment in the particular case would have been a desirable one if the deed had been executed by both Hill and his wife, is not the question. That would be "the circumstances," as Lord Eldon puts it, of the particular case; but the rule, as he says, rests, not upon the particular case, but upon general principles. The disqualification to make the arrangement, and thereby bind Mrs. Jeffries, arose from the fact that, in so doing, he was acting for her and for himself. Nor can it be doubted that Hill knew precisely what was being done, that Patty was to retain the money of his principal in payment of the sum due him, and that he (Hill) was to execute his note to Mrs. Jeffries to represent the sums he had before owned to Patty and Mrs. Gaston. In truth, the very transaction demonstrated that Patty was representing both himself and his principal; for he agreed, as an individual, to cancel the deed of trust and the note he held against Hill, and deliver them over to him, and this was done as a part and parcel of the arrangement. Dealing thus surreptitiously with the agent was a fraud upon the principal, and Hill, equally with Patty, was subject to the right of the principal to repudiate the contract upon receiving knowledge of its character. Norris v. Tayloe, 49 Ill. 18, 95 Am. Dec. 568; Panama & S. P. Teleg. Co. v. India Rubber, G. P. & Teleg. Works Co. L. R. 10 Ch. 515. In the case of Panama & S. P. Teleg. Co. v. India Rubber, G. P. & Teleg. Works Co. supra, the complainant had contracted with the defendant company to lay a submarine cable, payments to be made, as the work progressed, upon the estimates and certificates of Sir C. T. Bright, the complainant's engineer. After the contract had been made, the defendant made a contract with Bright to lay the cable. The complainant had paid the defendant company £60,000 on the contract, when it discovered that its engineer had entered into the contract with the defendant, and thereupon exhibited its bill for cancelation of the contract and to recover the sum it had paid. Full relief was afforded, the court holding that any surreptitious dealing between one principal and the agent of the other principal is a fraud on such other principal, cognizable in equity. James, L. J., said: "That I take to be a clear proposition, and I take it, according to my view, to be equally clear that the defrauded principal, if he comes in time, is entitled, at his option, to have the contract rescinded, or, if he elects not to have it rescinded, to have such other adequate relief as the court may think right to give him." In that case, as in this, the fraud upon the principal did not consist in an actual purpose to cheat the principal. In that case, the fault was in dealing with the agent in such manner as to create personal interests inconsistent with the discharge of his full duty to the principal. In this it was in dealing with him in reference to a matter in which he had an adverse personal interest. We do not suppose the defendant Hill, at the time the arrangement was made, purposed not to pay the debt to Mrs. Jeffries. But he now refuses to do so, and relies upon the cancelation by Patty of the original security as a reply to the complainant's prayer for subrogation to its benefit; and the complainant responds that this cancelation was a part of a contract entered into between Patty, the agent of Mrs. Jeffries, and the defendant, by which she was not bound, and that the defendant, by the very nature of the transaction, was advised that Patty, by reason of his adverse interest, was incompetent to bind his principal, and both he and Hill took the chance of ratification or repudiation by the principal.

We take it to be the law that Patty could not, without express authority from Mrs. Jeffries, thus transfer to her his claim against Hill, and that Hill, having notice of the want of authority of the agent, stands in no better situation, and that the representative of Mrs. Jeffries has the right to repudiate the contract, and have such restoration of the status quo as is now practicable; and since it is evident that only by subrogating the complainant to the security afforded by the deed of trust to Patty can adequate relief be afforded, the chancellor should have so decreed.

So much of the decree as denies to complainant the right of subrogation is reversed, and a decree may be entered here directing sale of the property described in complainant's bill for the amount agreed to be due and all costs.

So ordered.

Whitfield, J., dissenting:

In addition to the facts set out by my Brother Cooper, I deem it important to a proper understanding of this case that certain other facts, shown by this record, and fully set out in the very clear and fair abstract of the case made by the learned counsel for appellant, should be stated. In the opinion of the court it is said that, after some small payments had been made on the note to the administrator of Mrs. Jeffries, "it was then discovered that the wife of Hill had not joined in the trust deed securing the note to Mrs. Jeffries." But the wife of Hill had not joined in the first trust deed, executed in December, 1885, nor in the second, executed in January, 1889,—both made to secure Patty in the payment of the purchase price of the land. Again, it is stated in the opinion of the court that, "on final hearing, it was agreed that the sum due by Hill was $500." To avoid misconception, it should be stated that the admission was that that sum "was due on said note,"—the new note to Mrs. Jeffries,—and not on the purchase money of the land. Patty, some time after the execution of the second trust deed, to secure himself, in January, 1889, had in his hands money belonging to Mrs. Jeffries, as her agent. "He was intrusted by her to invest her money to her best interest, and in none of such investments was she consulted." About the 1st of January, 1890, Patty had Hill execute a note to Mrs. Jeffries for $650, and a trust deed to secure it, in which, as usual between Patty and Hill, Hill's wife did not join. This sum was to pay Patty the balance of the purchase money on the land, and to Mrs. Gaston a loan due her by Hill; Patty having also acted as the agent of Mrs.

Gaston. Patty is dead, and Hill did not testify; so that what took place between them is unknown. This sum of money—$650—was not actually, it seems, handed by Patty to Hill, and then handed back by Hill to Patty as the agent of the two lenders, Mrs. Jeffries and Mrs. Gaston; but the transaction, so far as this record discloses, was, in effect, nothing but a mere loan by Patty to Hill, as agent of Mrs. Jeffries, and a payment, out of that loan, by Hill to Patty, as such agent, of the unpaid purchase money of the land and the debt due Mrs. Gaston. The actual manual handing back and forth of the money would have been a perfectly idle ceremony. The notes and trust deeds, executed by Hill to secure Patty and Mrs. Gaston, were canceled and delivered up, those debts being thereby extinguished and paid off in full. There is absolutely nothing in the record to show any intention whatever, on the part of Patty, as agent of Mrs. Jeffries and Mrs. Gaston, and Hill, to keep those debts alive, or to renew them. The intention of both accorded perfectly with, and is shown by, what they did. They extinguished fully and forever those debts, and the notes and trust deeds evidencing and securing them were canceled and surrendered up to Hill. Further, the note and trust deed for the purchase money were not assigned to Mrs. Jeffries. On the contrary, she, through her agent Patty, chose her own security,—carved out a new and independent security,—and various payments were made thereon. Hill was an illiterate man, who could not "read writing much," but was believed, in the language of one of counsel testifying, to be "a worthy poor man."

This being the case made by the record, it seems to me that it is impossible to distinguish it from Howell v. Bush, 54 Miss. 437, and that case is decisive of it. That case was thoroughly considered. There was an original opinion, a rehearing, a second opinion, and a further petition for reargument denied. Said Judge Campbell, speaking for a unanimous court: "A new trust deed was given by Howell, and the old one extinguished. There was no intention to keep it alive. It was not relied on, and was therefore canceled. It was not done by fraud or mistake, but honestly and intentionally, for the purpose of getting it out of the way. True, it was done ignorantly as to the law requiring the joinder of the wife to make the new deed of trust valid as against the homestead right; but that does not alter the fact that the parties did not intend to keep the former trust deed alive, but to cancel it, and rely exclusively on the new one taken. When parties capable of contracting make their own arrangements, and there is neither fraud nor mistake of fact, equity will not interpose to thwart their designs or change their agreements. It will not make contracts for parties." And this doctrine has been as expressly declared in Skaggs v. Nelson, 25 Miss. 94, and Pitts v. Parker, 44 Miss. 247, and was always the law here, as I understand it, until the unreported case of McMullen v. Home Invest. Co. (1894), and Union Mortgage, Bldg. & T. Co. v. Peters, 72 Miss. 1058, 30 L. R. A. 829, in which I dissented. I said, in my dissenting opinion in that case, that it practically overruled Howell v. Bush, supra, and I think the correctness of that remark is unanswerably demonstrated by the result in this case. My brethren, however, profess to adhere to both Union Mortgage, Bldg. & T. Co. v. Peters, and Howell v. Bush. How they do so, with all deference, I cannot comprehend; for, as I view them, there never were two cases in more patent and irreconcilable conflict. Entertaining their views of the doctrine of subrogation, it seems to me they should expressly overrule Howell v. Bush, and not leave it to further mislead the bench and bar. The learned counsel for appellant makes an ingenious argument to avoid the effect of Howell v. Bush, insisting earnestly that what took place was a renewal of the purchase-money debt, but the parties were changed, and a new creditor introduced, and I understand my brethren to concur with me that that contention cannot be maintained. I conclude, therefore, as to subrogation: First, that the vendor's lien was paid off and discharged when the trust deed to Patty, the vendor, was satisfied, canceled, and delivered up to Hill, and the trust deed to secure Mrs. Jeffries was given, and there was no vendor's lien existing, when the bill was filed, to which complainant could be subrogated. Skaggs v. Nelson, supra, is conclusive of this. For, secondly, if it be said that the vendor's lien can now be assigned, the perfect response is that the fact in this case is it was neither so assigned, nor intended by the parties to be so assigned. Had it been, the note and trust deed to Patty would not have been canceled and delivered to Hill, but assigned, as they might easily have been, to Mrs. Jeffries. And, thirdly, equity never enforces conventional subrogation against the proved intent of the parties. Because what Patty thought at the time of the execution of the trust deed to secure Mrs. Jeffries, and Hill also thought, was a valid trust deed has turned out to be invalid, and their thought about its validity has been found to be a mistake of law, honestly made by both, to substitute the situation as it has ultimated for the situation as it was when the Jeffries trust deed was made, and impute to the parties to that contract an intention they would have entertained had they known that the joinder of the wife was essential to the validity of that trust deed, is, it seems to me, to repeal the statute requiring the joinder of the wife, and to work out subrogation, by ex post facto intention; and I see here no element of legal subrogation. See authorities cited in my dissenting opinion in Union Mortgage, Bldg. & T. Co. v. Peters, supra.

Turning, now, to the very clear statement of the feature of the law of agency discussed, as put by my Brother Cooper, I have to say that I heartily approve it. But I have searched the record in vain for any testimony to which that principle applies. The answer emphatically denies any fraud on Hill's part,—any co-operation on his part with Patty to defraud Mrs. Jeffries,—and avers that, if there was any "fraud on Patty's part, it lies between complainant and her agent." And the testimony wholly fails to connect Hill with any fraud which Patty practised on his principal, Mrs. Jeffries. I quite agree with my Brother Cooper's statement of the abstract law, but I differ from him wholly as to its applicability to the concrete case before us. Says Mr. Mechem (Mechem, Agency, § 796): "A third person, however, who deals with an agent, is not liable to the principal for a fraud perpetrated by the agent upon his principal in that transaction unless such third person was a party to the fraud." To this proposition he cites the cases of Mason v. Bauman, 62 Ill. 76, and Bacon v. Markley, 46 Ind. 116, both directly in point. In the former the court says, at page 81: "It is, however, urged that they knew that Starkweather was appellee's agent. . . . We are unable to comprehend how that fact could charge them with notice that Starkweather was acting fraudulently towards his principal. A man is always bound by the fraudulent acts of his own agent perpetrated on a third person whilst acting under his authority in reference to the subject of his agency; but we are aware of no rule nor any adjudged case which holds that a party can ever be bound by the fraudulent acts of another man's agent. And why should they? They do not appoint the agent; they confer upon him no authority, and do no act that should, in morals or in law, render them liable for the acts of another man's agent upon whom they conferred no power." The case cited by my learned brother (Panama & S. P. Teleg. Co. v. Indian Rubber, G. P. & Teleg. Works Co. L. R. 10 Ch. 515, 14 Moak, Eng. Rep. 759) was a case of flagrant fraud, clearly proved to have been shared in by the third party,—a case of one party, in effect, bribing the agent of the other party, falling under the cases classed by Mechem (Agency, § 797,—where it is cited) "where the third person conspires with the agent." Nor must this case be confounded with that other and wholly different category, where the agent pays his own debt with the principal's money, the creditor of the agent knowing it was the principal's money,—finely illustrated by the cases cited in the note to Gerard v. McCormick (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 234, a category in which, as stated in Smith v. James, 53 Ark. 137, "it was only necessary that [the third party] should know that the person with whom he dealt was an agent, in order to be apprised that the transaction was beyond the scope of his authority." Here Hill knew that Patty was Mrs. Jeffries' agent, and that the money of Mrs. Jeffries was loaned to him, and that, with that money, made his (Hill's) own by the borrowing, he paid off Patty's trust deed. How is it possible to safely say that, from these meager facts alone, the court below should have found that Patty had, in the dealing, an individual interest adverse to his principal, within the knowledge of Hill, and that Hill conspired with Patty to defraud his principal, Mrs. Jeffries, especially in view of the settled rule that fraud must be established by clear and convincing proof? It is perfectly clear that both Hill and Patty honestly believed the trust deed to Mrs. Jeffries was not only a valid, but an abundantly sufficient, security, when given. If it had been, would any court hold that Patty's interest in paying his debt was adverse to Mrs. Jeffries, whom he had abundantly secured,—much less that Hill aided Patty to defraud her? Since it has turned out that it was invalid, can the mere fact that it has so turned out make his interest adverse? But, even if that were conceded, does the further necessary fact appear that Hill then, at the time, knew all this, and conspired with Patty to defraud Mrs. Jeffries? The learned chancellor below—one of the ablest, most conscientiously painstaking, and accurate judges who ever adorned the bench of this state—has found the issue of fact on this branch of the case against appellant, and in my judgment the decree should be affirmed. I sympathize deeply with the feeling that Hill should not keep a home he has not paid for, but I am restrained from yielding to this prompting by the reflection that a general rule for the administration of justice according to the established principles of law, though not availing against the injustice of a particular instance, is better than the judicial chaos which would result from its nonobservance. Human equity corrects the defects of human law, arising by means of its universality. That equity which is administered by the Omniscient alone is alone equal to meting out absolute right in every case. I regret that I am forced to dissent from my brothers, but, the difference of opinion entertained by me amounting to conviction, no other course is open to me.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Montana, Appt.,
v.
CAMP SING, Respt.

1. A statute will not be declared void unless its nullity and invalidity are beyond reasonable doubt.

2. A license tax upon persons and corporations, imposed by the legislature, of which a portion of the proceeds is given to the county, does not violate Const. art. 12, § 4, prohibiting the legislature from levying taxes in any county, city, or town for county, town, or municipal purposes, since it is not clear that a license tax is within the intent of this constitutional provision.

(April 6, 1896.)

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the District Court for Silver Bow County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover a license fee for conducting the laundry business. Reversed.

Statement by De Witt, J.:

The state appeals from a judgment rendered against it upon the sustaining of defendant's demurrer to the complaint. The state brought the action to recover a license fee of $50, alleged to be due from defendant for conducting the laundry business for six months, and also for costs and penalties amounting to $17. The statute under which the state claimed the license is § 4079 of the Political Code, which is as follows: "Sec. 4079. Every male person engaged in the laundry business, other than the steam laundry business, must pay a license of $10 per quarter: provided, that where more than one person is engaged or employed or kept at work, such male person or persons shall pay a license of $25 per quarter, which shall be the license for one place of business only."

NOTE.—For another question as to division of license taxes between state and counties, see People, Einsfeld, v. Murray (N. Y.) ante, 344.

The contention of the defendant upon the demurrer is that this license law of the Political Code is unconstitutional and void under article 12 of the Constitution. The sections of that article upon which he bases his contention are Nos. 1 and 4, which are as follows:

"Sec. 1. The necessary revenue for the support and maintenance of the state shall be provided by the legislative assembly, which shall levy a uniform rate of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, except that specially provided for in this article. The legislative assembly may also impose a license tax, both upon persons and upon corporations doing business in the state."

"Sec. 4. The legislative assembly shall not levy taxes upon the inhabitants or property in any county, city, or town, or municipal corporation for county, town, or municipal purposes, but it may by law vest in the corporate authorities thereof powers to assess and collect taxes for such purposes."

This license tax was imposed by the legislative assembly. Pol. Code, § 4079. Under the provisions of §§ 3075 and 4050 of the Political Code, 70 per cent of the license tax provided for is to be retained by the county, and 30 per cent paid over to the state. The district court held that, as a portion of this license tax, to wit, 70 per cent, went to the county, the law was void under § 4, art. 12, of the Constitution, in that the legislative assembly had thus attempted by § 4079, Pol. Code, to levy a tax upon the inhabitants or property in a county for county purposes. Whether this legislation upon the question of licenses is constitutional is the question for determination of the opinion below.

Messrs. Henri J. Haskell, Attorney General, Ella Knowles Haskell, and Carpenter & Carpenter, for appellant:

Sections 4040-4051 of the Political Code are not in contravention of the Constitution of Montana.

The authority given by the Constitution to impose a license tax is found in § 1, art. 12.

A license tax is not a tax within the meaning of the word "taxes" in § 4, art. 12, of the Constitution.

1. In the Constitution are developed two separate and distinct schemes for raising revenue, to wit:

(a) The taxation scheme.

(b) The license scheme.

The license scheme is composite—formed by blending in the legislative assembly the power to license for regulation with the power to license for revenue.

The constitutional scheme of taxation applies only to property.

The words "assess," "levy," and "rate" as used in the Constitution, were intended to apply to taxation upon the ownership of property, and are the apt words to indicate such application.

All taxes are personal.

Green v. Craft, 28 Miss. 70.

The tax is imposed upon the person of the owner on account of his ownership of the property.

Rundell v. Lakey, 40 N. Y. 517; Everson v. Syracuse, 29 Hun, 486; Burroughs, Taxn. § 7; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 436.

In § 4 the words "taxes upon the inhabitants or property" express a single idea, and that is a tax for revenue on account of the ownership of property.

When § 4 is read in connection with the license provision of § 1, it is clear that although "taxes upon the inhabitants" and "taxes upon property" separately considered may not always mean the same thing, yet the effect of both expressions combined is to limit the restriction of § 4 to taxation of property, whether as matter of form the tax be assessed upon the property or assessed to the owner.

The word "inhabitants" in said section was not intended to have a technical meaning.

The particular provision for license taxes in § 1 is to be treated as an exception to the general tax rule laid down in § 4.

Potter's Dwarr. Stat. 272, 273; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 399.

The opinions of the framers of the Constitution expressed during the preparation of the instrument are of great weight in its interpretation, when the meaning is not perfectly clear and obvious.

A clear distinction exists between a license, which is a right granted by some competent authority to do an act which, without such a license, would be illegal, and a tax, which is a rate or sum of money assessed on the property of a citizen.

In case the respondent is the owner of the property upon which his laundry is situated, he is taxed upon the value thereof under the general laws of taxation, but, for the privilege of carrying on the laundry business, he is required to pay a license which is not a tax upon property and is not included within the word "taxes" as used in § 4, art. 12, of the Constitution.

Mr. Thomas E. Harvey, for respondent:

The whole of a section must be construed together, and not separate clauses of it.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 316.

Section 1, art. 12, treats solely of "the necessary revenue for the support and maintenance of the state."

The framers of the Constitution, anticipating and realizing that the amount of revenue which might be raised and collected by the state by this method under the restrictions contained in § 9, art. 12, relating to the rate of taxation, might not be sufficient to meet "the necessary revenue for the support and maintenance of the state," and in the closing clause of § 1 provide: "The legislative assembly may also impose a license tax upon persons and corporations doing business in the state."

Different sentences in the same section are to be referred respectively to other sentences to which they relate.

Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 585.

And this last clause of § 1, by the use of the word "also," refers to the sentence preceding. The word "also" takes the place of the words "for the support and maintenance of the state if they deem it necessary."

The legislative assembly, were this clause eliminated from the Constitution, would have authority to "impose a license tax upon persons and corporations doing business in the state," for there is no restriction upon the authority of the legislative assembly unless one is imposed in the Constitution.

Cooley, Taxn. 570; 1 Desty, Taxn. 302; Newton v. Atchison, 31 Kan. 151, 47 Am. Rep. 486.

The last clause of § 1, art. 12, was unnecessary for the purpose of conferring authority upon the legislative assembly.

The constitutional convention did not attempt to abolish the distinction between licenses for regulation and revenue.

Section 4 is a limitation upon the power of the legislative assembly.

The word "tax" means a burden—charge imposed upon person or property to raise money for public purposes.

1 Desty, Taxn, 1; Cooley, Taxn. 1.

Licenses are levied for two purposes: (1) for revenue; (2) for regulation; and are sustainable on either or both grounds.

Cooley, Taxn. 572.

License fees are taxes and means of exercising the taxing power of the state when revenue is the main purpose for which they are imposed.

De Witt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Does § 4, art. 12, of the Constitution prohibit the legislature from passing a law such as § 4079, Pol. Code 1895, imposing a license tax upon persons and corporations doing business in the state, when part of the proceeds of such license tax goes to the county; and can such license tax be imposed only by the county, which is part recipient of the funds collected in pursuance of such statute? This important question could have been reached in the case of State, Toi, v. French, 17 Mont. 54, 30 L. R. A. 415. It was within our contemplation at the time of writing that opinion, but the question was not mentioned or argued by counsel, and was therefore reserved. It has since engaged the consideration of several of the district courts, and of many of the most distinguished members of the bar in the state. The result is that it has been thoroughly briefed and argued at this time by eminent counsel on both sides. We are sensible of current affairs about us, and cannot but be aware that declaring § 4079, Pol. Code, to be unconstitutional, is the losing, for a considerable period of time, of an immense revenue, but we are obliged to close our minds to such considerations. As Mr. Justice Hunt said in State v. Mitchell, 17 Mont. 67: "It were far better at this time, in the early history of this new state, that a legislative act be declared invalid than that precedent be set by which plain provisions of the Constitution may be nullified by loose and questionable interpretations of our fundamental law. State, Woods, v. Tooker, 15 Mont. 8, 25 L. R. A. 560." See also State, Thomas Cruse Sav. Bank, v. Gilliam (Mont.) 31 L. R. A. 721. And in the matter before us it is better that we suffer all the inconveniences of a present loss of revenue than that we let go of the Constitution for the sake of relief from temporary distresses. The argument ab inconvenienti must be excluded from all control over the decision.

But, on the other hand, we must keep in mind another rule of constitutional construction. Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, said, in speaking of Chief Justice Shaw: "It has been said by an eminent jurist that when courts are called upon to pronounce the invalidity of an act of legislation, passed with all the forms and ceremonies requisite to give it the force of law, they will approach the question with great caution, examine it in every possible aspect, and ponder upon it as long as deliberation and patient attention can throw any new light upon the subject; and never declare a statute void unless the nullity and invalidity of the act are placed, in their judgment, beyond reasonable doubt. A reasonable doubt must be solved in favor of the legislative action, and the act be sustained." Cooley, Const. Lim. 182. Judge Cooley also quotes the following from Chief Justice Marshall in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 128, 3 L. ed. 175. "The question, whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the Constitution is, at all times, a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled by duty to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station, could it be unmindful of the solemn obligations which that station imposes. But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." He quotes further from Mr. Justice Washington, as follows: "But if I could rest my opinion in favor of the constitutionality of the law on which the question arises on no other ground than this doubt so felt and acknowledged, that alone would, in my estimation, be a satisfactory vindication of it. It is but a decent respect to the wisdom, the integrity, and the patriotism of the legislative body by which any law is passed to presume in favor of its validity until its violation of the Constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt." See also Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 178. Therefore, with these principles before us, and deeply sensible of the importance to the state of this decision, we approach its consideration with the sentiment that we must be at least fairly satisfied of the Constitutionality of the license law before we so declare it. The legislature has full power to enact a license law, unless it is forbidden by the Constitution. In the case of State, Toi, v. French, supra, after stating the common learning as to the difference between the Constitution of a state and that of the United States, we said: "A state legislature is not acting under enumerated or granted powers, but rather under inherent powers, restricted only by the provisions of their sovereign Constitution. We therefore inquire whether our Constitution restrains the legislature from enacting such a law as §§ 4079, 4080, Pol. Code." We make the same inquiry now. Article 12 of the Constitution treats the subject of revenue and taxation. As observed by both counsel in this case, this article provides two systems for raising money. Without intending to be now wholly technical in the use of words, we may describe them as (1) the taxation system, and (2) the license system. We use these terms now simply for convenience, and not as an expression of an opinion in advance as to whether this license is a tax or not. If the legislature sees fit, all revenues may be raised by taxation. Taxation is the security for the debts and expenses. The license system is a further provision. As exigencies arise or do not arise, or cease to exist, the license system may be or need not be resorted to. That system is elastic and pliable, and can be suited to circumstances. The important question in this case is, What restraint, if any, is placed upon the legislature in creating a license system? Before examining this question, we will notice that which appears in contrast; that is to say, the restrictions which are placed upon the power of the legislature as to taxation. They are very many. They are an inheritance of our history. We will review some of them. The rate of assessment and taxation shall be uniform, under such regulations as secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, etc. Article 12, § 1. Liberal exemptions are provided for. Id. § 2. Mines and mining claims in the state are liberally protected from what might be, perhaps, deemed excessive taxation. Id. § 3. The valuation of the property for taxation for any town and school purposes shall not be greater than the valuation for state and county purposes. Id. § 5. The taking of private property for corporate debts of public corporations is guarded against. Id. § 8. Provision is made for maximum rate of taxation for state purposes. Id. § 9. All state taxes shall be paid into the state treasury, and shall not be drawn out but in pursuance of specific appropriations made by law. Id. § 10. Taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws and for public purposes only, and shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, within the limits of the authority levying the tax. Id. § 11. It does not seem necessary to go further in citing the limitations put upon the power of taxation. The whole of article 12 treats this subject of limitation with great care. In almost every section can be found prohibitions or limitations upon the legislative power as to taxation.

But the license system of raising revenue and license taxes are mentioned by name in only one place in the Constitution. That is the last sentence of § 1, which says: "The legislative assembly may also impose a license tax, both upon persons and upon corporations doing business in this state." With that utterance the Constitution leaves the subject; that is, as far as any direct language is to be found. The license tax is not even controlled by the equality and uniformity requirements of the Constitution. State, Toi, v. French, supra. But, while the question of license taxes is not mentioned, in terms, elsewhere in the Constitution, the defendant has presented a very able argument to the effect that the last sentence of § 1, art. 12, and also § 4, while not so providing in direct language, must be read and interpreted to the effect that the legislature is indeed prohibited from imposing a license tax, the proceeds of which, or part of the proceeds, are to go to the county. His first argument is found in the use of the word "also" in the last sentence of § 1. He contends that this word carries over into the sentence where it occurs the idea expressed in the sentence which precedes it. That is to say, that when the section says that the legislative assembly may also impose a license tax, etc., it means that it may also impose such license tax for the support and maintenance of the state; and therefore that it cannot be imposed by the legislature partly for the support and maintenance of a county. But we do not think that the word "also" necessarily or reasonably has such meaning. It appears to us to be nothing more than a conjunctive, perhaps connecting the two sentences. It has about the same significance as "furthermore." Webster's International Dictionary gives the following definitions of the word "also:" "In addition; besides; as well; further; too. 'Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven; . . . for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.' Matthew vi., 20, 21." The Century Dictionary gives these definitions: "In like manner; likewise; in addition; too; further. 'In fact, Mr. Emerson, himself, besides being a poet and a philosopher, and also a plain Concord citizen.' Holmes on Emerson. 'This ye knowen also well as I.' Chaucer's Canterbury Tales." The simple reading of the whole section, to our minds, is that "the necessary revenue for the support and maintenance of the state shall be provided," etc., "and, in addition to this, and furthermore, the legislature may impose a license tax," etc. The use of the word "also" is to simply connect the ideas of the two systems of revenue mentioned in the section. It introduces the creation of the second system, to wit, the license system. In this sentence the license system first appears, and the sense of the whole section is simply that "there shall be the taxation system, and, furthermore, or also, the license system." Any common illustration of the use of the word "also," as employed in daily life, demonstrates that it does not carry over into the sentence where it is used all of the ideas expressed in the preceding sentence. One may say: "This morning I shall go to the statehouse for the purpose of arguing a case before the supreme court. I shall also stop at the county court house." The word "also" by no means conveys the idea that the speaker intends to stop at the latter place for the same purpose which called him to the former. We are of opinion there is no real merit in defendant's contention as to the use of this word "also."

Therefore, having passed this branch of the contention, there are no such limitations upon the power of the legislature as are contended for by the defendant, unless they are found in § 4 of art. 12. We will examine that section in a moment. We pause at this point to suggest another matter, and that is, to examine the opinions of the framers of the Constitution, which they recorded during the preparation of this article 12. Such opinions may be examined as tending to show the intention. This was done in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 39 L. ed. 759, popularly known as the "Income Tax Case," in which Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said: "We inquire, therefore, What, at the time the Constitution was framed and adopted, were recognized as direct taxes?" What did those who framed and adopted it understand the terms to designate and include? The learned chief justice then went into an extensive examination of the history of the country, and the debates in the constitutional convention of the United States. We have consulted the proceedings and debates of the constitutional convention of this state at pages 1325 et seq., as filed in the office of the secretary of state. There was an earnest debate over § 1, art. 12, and many opinions were forcibly expressed that the state should not adopt a license system at all. It was also proposed to amend the last sentence of § 1, art. 12, to read as follows: "The legislative assembly may also impose a license tax for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors and other occupations requiring police supervision, both upon persons and upon corporations doing business in the state, and no license shall be imposed for any other purpose." The proposed amendment was defeated. The last member who spoke upon the question was the Honorable T. E. Collins, chairman of the committee on finance, and who was also chairman of the same committee in the old constitutional convention of 1884. He said that it would be safe to leave this matter to the legislative assembly. The sentiment of the convention was to this effect. So, instead of putting restrictions upon the power of the legislature as to licenses, as was done as to taxes, the constitutional convention deliberately, and after earnest debate and consideration, declined to do so. Therefore, with all the evidence, both intrinsic and extrinsic, that the Constitution intended to and did carefully limit the legislative power as to taxation, and the total lack of evidence that it was the intention to so limit legislation upon the subject of licenses, may the language of § 4 be construed as a prohibition upon the legislature to impose a license tax for county purposes? In the first place, if § 4 is such a prohibition, then there seems to us to exist a repugnancy between that section and the last sentence of § 1. The latter says broadly that the legislature may impose a license tax upon persons and corporations, etc. There is no qualification upon this power found in § 1. The power, as we have above construed § 1, is not in that section confined to imposing the license tax for state purposes only. This unlimited power being given directly by § 1, and deliberately, as the debates show, then, if we are to find it afterwards limited by § 4, the words of § 4 to such effect should be clear. Cooley, Const. Lim. above cited. We do not think it is clear, and we will point out the reasons for such opinion.

Of course, if the words "levy taxes," used in § 4, mean "license taxes," then the prohibition contended for by the defendant exists; and, if those words do not mean "license taxes," the prohibition does not exist. In either event it is, in our opinion, immaterial whether the license tax is for regulation or for revenue, and the distinction in license fees, as to whether they are for regulation or for revenue, is not important in this case. Even if the license tax be for revenue (which it probably is), and if it should, therefore, be construed to be a tax as that term is used in the cases distinguishing between a tax and a license fee for regulation, it is, in any event, a license tax provided for by the Constitution, whether imposed for either purpose. It is therefore constitutional for either purpose, unless, of course, license taxes were within the contemplation of the framers when they used the words "levy taxes" and "assess and collect taxes" in § 4. The use of several words in article 12 is, to our mind, important. The article in speaking of ordinary taxation and taxes, uses the words "levy," "assess," and "rate." In the only place in the article where license tax is mentioned, the word is "impose." The former words were apt in speaking of taxes, and the latter, in our opinion, is appropriate in describing licenses. As to the words "assess," "rate," and "levy," we note the following definition from standard dictionaries:

"Assess: Taxes in respect of land and houses are calculated with reference to the estimated value of the property, which is arrived at by a process called 'assessment.'" Rapalje & L. Law Dict.

"Assess: (2) To adjust or fix the proportion of a tax which each person of several liable to it has to pay; to apportion a tax among several; to distribute taxation in a proportion founded on the proportion of burden and benefit. (3) To place a valuation upon property for the purpose of apportioning a tax." Black, Law Dict.

"Assess: To set, fix, or charge a certain sum upon, by way of tax; as to assess each individual in due proportion." Century Dict.

"Assess: (1) To rate or fix the proportion which each person is to pay of a tax; to tax; to adjust the shares of a contribution by several persons toward a common object, according to the benefit received; to fix the value or the amount of a thing; to determine by rules of law a sum to be paid; to rate the proportional contribution due to a fund; to fix the amount payable by a person or persons in satisfaction of an established demand." Anderson, Law Dict.

"Rate: It sometimes occurs in a connection which gives it a meaning synonymous with 'assessment;' that is, the apportionment of a tax among the whole number of persons who are responsible for it, by estimating the value of the taxable property of each, and making a proportional distribution of the whole amount. Thus we speak of 'rating' persons and property." Black, Law Dict.

"Rate: A sum assessed as a tax; in England, a local tax; as the county, the borough, the poor rate. May apply to the percentage of taxation, or to the valuation of the property." Anderson, Law Dict.

"Ratable: 'Ratable estate,' within the meaning of a tax law, is a taxable estate." Anderson, Law Dict.

"Levy: To raise, execute, exact, collect, gather, take up, seize. Thus, to levy (raise or collect) a tax; to levy (raise or set up) a nuisance; to levy (acknowledge) a fine; to levy (inaugurate) war; to levy and execute,—i. e., to levy or collect a sum of money on an execution." Black, Law Dict.

"Levy: (Law) (1) To seize or take (property) by virtue of a judicial writ thereunto commanding. (2) To impose or assess (a tax) on property, and collect it under authority of law." Standard Dict.

The definitions all carry the popular understanding of the words. They are appropriately used when speaking of taxation, and, we believe, with the scholarship, learning, and ability which were present in the constitutional convention, they were deliberately used. They involve the ascertaining of values and fixing taxes in proportion thereto, and are used all through article 12, in regard to taxes and taxation. See sections of the article. But none of these words are used in the last sentence of § 1, art. 12, where the license tax is provided for. There the word is "impose." That word is derived from the Latin word imponere, meaning literally "to lay upon." Therefore we find throughout the whole of article 12 distinctive words used in speaking of the taxation system and the license system. Then we come to § 4, which defendant claims refers to licenses. There the words are "levy" and "assess,"—the same words always applied in the article to the subject of taxation strictly. "Impose," the word adopted in treating of license taxes, is not used. It is deliberately omitted from § 4. Before the Constitution was finally adopted, a committee was appointed, and acted upon the subject of "revision and phraseology." Therefore, with all the debate in the convention, and with a final technical and literary revision of the Constitution, we are of opinion that the use of the words "assess," "levy," and "rate" as to the one subject, and "impose" as to the others, is significant. Such words seem to express an intent that § 4 should refer to taxation strictly, and not to licenses. In any event, it is by no means clear to us that the intent of § 4 was to refer to licenses; and, if the intent is not clear, we cannot put such construction upon it as will nullify the law under consideration. Cooley, Const. Lim. above quoted.

Great importance is attached by the defendant to the case of People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153, and that case is claimed by him to be applicable to the question now before us. The section of the Constitution of California which it is urged is practically the same as our § 4, art 12, is § 12, art. 11. It reads as follows: "Sec. 12. The legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns, or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes, but may, by general laws, vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes." The case of People v. Martin was an action to recover a license tax by reason of the defendant carrying on the business of selling goods. It was brought under § 3360 of the Political Code of California, which was a portion of the license law enacted by the legislature of California before the adoption of the present Constitution of that state. The California court held that said license law was unconstitutional by reason of Const. art. 11, § 12. Mr. Justice Ross, in delivering the opinion, said: "The important question in the case is, whether or not the word 'taxes,' as used in this section of the Constitution, includes license taxes; for, if it does, the provisions of the Political Code, imposing and providing for the collection of the license tax here in question, are clearly inconsistent with this section of the Constitution and therefore inoperative by virtue of § 1, art. 22, of the same instrument. That the license fees imposed by the provisions of the Political Code were so imposed mainly, if not solely, for the purposes of revenue, does not admit of doubt; and where that is the case, they are, in effect, taxes (Cooley, Taxn. pp. 396, 397; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 768). Indeed, the statute itself designates the charge as a license tax (Pol. Code, § 3359). But are they 'taxes' within the meaning of § 12, art. 11, of the Constitution? We are of the opinion that they are. It is clear that that section is not limited to taxes upon property, for by its express language the legislature is prohibited from imposing taxes upon the inhabitants of counties, cities, towns, or other public or municipal corporations, as well as upon their property, for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes. The defendant is an inhabitant of the county of Santa Cruz, engaged in the business of selling goods, wares, and merchandise. The tax imposed upon him, and which it is proposed to collect, was undoubtedly imposed for county purposes; for, as already observed, the statute authorizing it required the tax when collected to be paid into the county treasury for the use of the county general fund. The power to impose such taxes for such purposes, in our opinion, no longer remains with the legislature; but the Constitution expressly gives it the power, by general laws, to vest in the corporate authorities of the counties, cities, towns, or other public or municipal corporations, the power to assess and collect taxes for those purposes." But the important distinction between the California Constitution and ours, and the California decision and that which we intend to make, is that there is wholly absent from the California Constitution a provision like the last sentence in § 1, art. 12, viz.: "The legislative assembly may also impose a license tax, both upon persons and upon corporations doing business in the state." This sentence we have endeavored to construe above, and the construction which we place upon it, and the fact of its absence from the California Constitution, render, in our opinion, the California decision inapplicable. Further than that, the California decision was not thoroughly considered, and was delivered by a divided court. The California Constitution upon the subject of revenue made no such distinctions between the words "impose," "levy," "assess," and "rate" as we find to be clearly made in the Constitution of Montana. It did not, as does ours, specially apply the one word to license taxes, and use the other words in referring to taxation strictly speaking. It cannot be argued that the prohibitory section in our Constitution is borrowed from California, because, by comparing the language of the two, it is seen that they are different. See the two sections above quoted. The California prohibitory section uses the word "impose;" ours uses the word "levy." But the great distinction between the two Constitutions, and the question of prohibition as contained in them, is in that last sentence of § 1 of our art. 12, which we have heretofore fully discussed.

Furthermore, much is made by the defendant of the use of the word "inhabitants" in our § 4. He argues that when the section says, "shall not levy taxes upon the inhabitants or property," the word "inhabitants" means "persons." The same word is used in the California Constitution, and the decision of People v. Martin turns largely upon that word. See citations from that case, supra. Defendant's contention is that the word "inhabitants" means "persons," as distinguished from "property," and that § 4 contains both words, viz.: "inhabitants" and "property," and therefore the prohibition is on both, as to levying taxes upon property and upon persons; and that the only kind of tax which could be levied upon persons would be the license tax, which is personal, while the tax upon property is not personal; and that, therefore, the use of the word "inhabitants" can mean nothing but a prohibition against the legislature levying the only kind of a personal tax, which is a license tax. This argument cannot be maintained, for this reason: that the distinction which the defendant seeks to make as to levying or assessing or imposing taxes upon persons and property is more apparent than real, if, indeed, it is even apparent. The words "persons" and "property" are sometimes used indiscriminately, even in instruments of the gravest importance and dignity. But the fact is that all taxes are levied upon persons, and not upon property. It is the person that is taxed or licensed. In case of taxation, strictly speaking, the property which the person owns is used to determine the amount of the tax which he shall pay; but it is the person who, after all, pays the tax, and not the property. The person is liable, and the property, in addition to being the means of determining what the person shall pay, is also a security for its payment. Upon this subject Judge Grover, of New York, said in Rundell v. Lakey: "It is, I think, apparent from the various provisions of the statute, that in respect to both real and personal property owned by a resident of the town or ward where the former is situate, that the tax is imposed upon the person of such owner on account of the ownership of such property, and his liability to such tax is conclusively fixed by the completion and delivery of the roll. The counsel for the appellants concedes that this is true as to personal property. I can see no substantial reason for a distinction between an assessment for real or personal property against an individual. Both are alike assessed to the owner. The tax is in both cases imposed upon the owner. Provision is made in both for the collection of the tax from the property of the owner by the collector of the town or ward." 40 N. Y. 516. It was also said in Everson v. Syracuse, 29 Hun, 486, by Judge Haight, then of the supreme court, and now of the court of appeals, in referring to Rundell v. Lakey, supra: "In that case the conveyance was made after the assessment, and before the tax was levied. The question was as to which of the parties was liable for the tax, the grantor or grantee. It was in that case held that the collector was not only authorized, but it was his duty, to collect the tax, if not otherwise paid, by seizing and selling the goods of the person against whom the tax has been assessed, or of any goods in his possession; that the person against whom the tax was assessed was primarily liable; that the tax levied is not a tax imposed upon the land, but that it is imposed upon the person on account of his ownership of the land, and that he is primarily liable for the payment of it; that the tax, when levied, simply becomes a lien upon the land." We take the following from Green v. Craft, 28 Miss. 70: "The term 'taxes,' it is said, 'includes all contributions imposed by the government upon individuals for the service of the state.' The individual, and not the property, pays the tax, and the property is resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the tax with which the owner must be charged, and for the purpose of enforcing payment when the owner shall be legally in default in paying at the time stipulated by law." See also Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. p. 476. It therefore being true that it is the person that is taxed, there seems to be no particular significance in the use of the two words "inhabitants" and "property" in Const. art. 12, § 4. While these two words are used, the subject-matter is the same. And if the section refers, as we have endeavored to show that it does, to taxation of property, it was not important that the section uses the words "inhabitants" as well as "property," for the result is the same, and the taxation referred to meant a property tax; that is to say, a tax upon a person, levied upon the basis of the property owned by him.

Another argument in favor of the view that it was the intention of the Constitution to commit the subject of license taxes to the legislature may perhaps be found in the fact of that legislative construction. Ever since the adoption of the Constitution, the legislature, either by allowing old laws to remain upon the statute books, or by enacting new ones, has recognized the principle that the subject of license taxes is for the legislature. The business of the state has been conducted upon this principle during its whole history. We mention this matter, not as of great importance, but as entitled to some slight consideration. As noted by Judge Cooley in the citations from eminent jurists given in the earlier part of this opinion, it is not upon slight or doubtful considerations that a court will declare that the legislature has disobeyed the Constitution. Another matter of slight importance, but tending in the same direction, is the fact that this license system has been in this court several times, and, while the question of its constitutionality has never been raised in any way, three decisions have been made which recognized it as a portion of the body of the state law, viz.: Barden v. Montana Club, 10 Mont. 330, 11 L. R. A. 593; State v. Raymond, 12 Mont. 226; and State v. Owsley, 17 Mont. 94. All of those cases were presented by very able counsel, and any one of them could have been determined upon the alleged unconstitutionality of the license-tax law, if the question had been raised. We do not, however, present this matter as one of any particular weight, for it is not entitled to such consideration. There are a few other matters which have been mentioned as reasons for sustaining the demurrer to this complaint. But little has been made of them by counsel, and we do not think even the respondent regarded them as important. We think the additional points so made are not well taken, but will not discuss them. The great question in the case, and that upon which both counsel rested their whole contention, is the constitutional matter which we have decided. That matter, after mature deliberation, we consider clear. Furthermore, we consider it absolutely clear that the unconstitutionality of the law in question is not so apparent as to justify this court in declaring the license law void.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed.

and the case is remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and proceed with the case.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

STATE of New Jersey, SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Prosecutor, Piff. in Err.,

v.

William C. HEPPENHEIMER et al.

(.....N. J.....)

*1. A charter which exempts a corporation or its property from taxation exempts also the shares of its stock held by individuals.

2. An express exemption of the shares from taxation, nothing else appearing, will also exempt the company itself from taxation.

3. The 6th section of the charter of the Singer Manufacturing Company exempts it from the operation of the act of April 18, 1884, and the supplement thereto of March 16, 1891.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a certiorari proceeding to set aside an assessment of taxes on plaintiff's property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. V. Lindabury and Joseph H. Choate for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John P. Stockton, Attorney General, for defendants in error.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error is a manufacturing corporation, chartered by special act of the legislature of this state (Pub. Laws 1873, p. 971), with a capital stock of $10,000,000, duly issued. The controversy relates to an assessment of $4,212.50, made by the state board of assessors against the company for the year 1891, under the supplement approved March 16, 1891 (Pub. Laws 1891, p. 150), of "An Act to Provide for the Incorporation of State Taxes upon Certain Corporations, and for the Collection thereof," approved April 18, 1884. It is called a "franchise tax," and is laid upon the entire capital of the company of $10,000,000, less $750,000, the assessed value of its personal and real property in this state. The company is liable to the tax laid upon it, unless it is exempted therefrom by force of the provisions of the sixth section of its charter, which is as follows: "And be it enacted that, whenever $500,000 shall have been paid in, said corporation may organize and proceed to business under this act, and shall immediately thereafter file with the secretary of state of this state a certificate of such payment and organization, whereupon, and not until then, this act shall take effect; and if, and so long as the said corporation shall invest, and keep invested in real estate within this state, the sum of $500,000, the real and personal property of the said corporation, not actually and in fact within the state of New Jersey, and the stock of the said corporation, held or owned by any of its stockholders, shall not be liable to any tax or impost whatsoever." As appears by the case, the company has invested $1,000,000 of its capital stock in manufacturing in this state. Previous to its incorporation in this state, the company was incorporated under the laws of the state of New York, where it had a large factory. It also had a factory in Glasgow, Scotland, one in Austria, and another in the state of Indiana. Upon the granting of its charter by this state, its New York factory was abandoned, and the business was removed to Elizabeth, N. J., where a large factory was erected, giving employment to over 4,000 men. It is admitted that the company has had ever since its incorporation, and that it still has, more than $500,000 invested in real estate in this state.

The question to be solved is whether the 6th section of its charter constitutes an irrepealable contract with the state, and, if it does, whether the imposition of this tax violates the contract. The 6th section contains all the elements of a contract. There is present a subject-matter, parties, and a consideration. On the one side is a complete performance, and on the other, acceptance. That it is a contract under our adjudications there can be no question. State v. Berry, 17 N. J. L. 80; Camden & A. R. Co. v. Hillegas, 18 N. J. L. 11; Proprietors of Bridges v. Hoboken Land & I. Co. 13 N. J. Eq. 86; Mount Pleasant Cemetery Co. v. Newark, 52 N. J. L. 539. Is this contract irrepealable? If the 6th section of the charter of the company contains the entire contract, it is unassailable by state legislation. Both the Federal and state constitutions inhibit the passage of any law by the state impairing the obligation of a contract. The state attempts to justify this tax by reading into the charter of the Singer Company the 6th section of the act of 1846 (Pub. Laws 1846, p. 16), which is as follows: "The charter of every corporation which shall hereafter be granted by or created under any of the acts of the legislature, shall be subject to alteration, suspension, and repeal in the discretion of the legislature." In New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 352, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that, notwithstanding the act of 1846, it was competent for the state legislature to make an irrepealable contract, and that, therefore, it was in every case a question whether it was intended to preserve to the state the right to repeal the contract at will. Unless, therefore, such an intention can fairly be drawn from the terms of the contract, as agreed upon by the parties, there can be no departure from it.

There is nothing in the language of this contract which gives the slightest foundation for the suggestion that the state reserved the right to deprive the company at will of the benefit it was to receive under the agreement, after full performance by the company. The undertaking is express that, if and so long as the company shall invest and keep invested $500,000 in real estate in this state, the exemption shall continue. There is no uncertainty in that respect. It excludes most clearly the idea that the act of 1846 was to be deemed a part of this charter. It cannot be conceived that either the state or the company entered into a contract by which it was understood or intended that the state should be at liberty to deprive the company of the benefit to be derived from it as soon as the company had performed on its part. Such a proposition could not have been seriously made on the part of the state, nor for a moment entertained on the part of the company. The terms of the contract and the circumstances attending it repel the assumption that the entire engagement is not expressed in the 6th section of the act of incorporation.

The contract must be regarded as irrepealable. The real question in the cause is, What are its true meaning and construction? In my view, it is unfortunate that judicial decision has so firmly established the doctrine that the legislature can barter away so essential an attribute of government as that of the power to tax, but it is now too late to call it in question. When a contract is fairly made, the good faith of the state must be preserved, and the contract performed according to a reasonable and just interpretation of it. The company was induced to erect a large and expensive factory in this state by this agreement to exempt from taxation, and it will be derogatory to the state to resort to any subterfuge or narrow and sharp construction in order to evade the effect of the contract. It may be well to observe here that it could not have been supposed by those who voted for the constitutional amendments of 1875 that it was intended to bestow upon the legislative branch of the state government the power to disregard and violate the contracts into which the state had previously entered. It would be a reflection upon the integrity of those who framed the amendments to infer such a power. The exemption is that the real and personal property of the said corporation, not actually in fact within the state of New Jersey, and the stock of the said corporation, held or owned by any of its stockholders, shall not be liable to any tax or impost whatsoever. It has long been the accepted law of this state that an enactment which exempts a corporation or its property from taxation exempts also the shares of its stock held by individuals. The reasoning of the court upon which that conclusion was rested was that, as the entire burden of taxes levied upon a corporation ultimately fell upon the shares of stock, it must have been the intention of the legislature, in exempting the former, to relieve the latter. State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 484; State, Vail, v. Bentley, Id. 532; State, Colt, v. Powers, 24 N. J. L. 400. The converse of this, it seems, must be conceded, so that an express exemption of the shares from taxation will also exempt the company; otherwise, the exemption is, in fact, not an exemption, for every burden cast upon the property of the company is a burden upon the shares which represent that property. I agree with the court below that we must resort to statutory construction to ascertain whether this case is within that rule. The legislature, if unhampered by contract, undoubtedly has power to exempt the company or its property and reserve the right to tax the shares, or to exempt the shares and reserve the right to tax the company and its property. The insistment is that the legislative intent to be drawn from the language of the 6th section of the charter is to relieve from taxation the shares of stock in the hands of stockholders, but to reserve the right of levying upon the corporation itself any legal imposition, except a tax on its real and personal property outside of New Jersey. In my judgment, that is not the correct interpretation of the statute, nor will it, if accepted, legalize the imposition. An exemption of the shares, in the absence of other language, would have exempted from taxation the property within as well as that without the state; and therefore the added words were inserted in order that the real and personal property of the company in this state might be taxed here. That is their apparent purpose and their entire effect. The statute was drawn to secure to the state the benefit of taxing the property which the company, for the grant of its franchises, agrees to bring into the state. "The real and personal property of the company not actually in fact within the state is not to be liable to any tax or impost whatsoever." More comprehensive language to assure absolute immunity could not be employed. The state pledged exemption, not from tax only, but from any imposition whatsoever. The word "imposition" includes every kind of enforced contribution to the public treasury. What the corporators evidently apprehended, and what the charter in express words guards against, was the laying of an imposition of any nature upon the real and personal property of the company outside of this state. It was well settled and understood that New Jersey could not impose a direct tax upon property of its citizens located beyond its jurisdiction. M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 415, 4 L. ed. 603.

It was not, therefore, to shield the company from direct taxation of its property not actually within the state that this provision in its charter was secured. Immunity to that extent existed without the consent of the state. The manifest object was to restrain the state from levying an indirect imposition upon the property of the company outside of the state, in the mode now resorted to, or in any other way. The language is most aptly chosen to protect the company. The "real and personal property of the company not actually in fact within the state" is exempted from any tax or impost whatsoever. The real and personal property of the company invested in Springfield, in Austria, and Scotland, and other places without our state, was in one sense within our state, in that it was represented by the $10,000,000 of its capital stock issued under its charter here, but it was not actually in fact within the state of New Jersey. The imposition of this tax upon so much of the $10,000,000 of capital stock of the company as is not represented by property in this state is, in its effect, as much an impost on property out of this state as if it was directly put upon the property itself, and not upon the capital which stands for it. It is an attempt to do by indirection what it is agreed in the contract shall not be done. The fact that it is styled a "franchise tax" cannot validate it. It is none the less an interdicted imposition because it is given a new name. The franchise of the company is the right to hold property and exercise its corporate privileges. All those rights and privileges were granted to the company by its charter upon the terms specified in it. Those terms cannot be changed or altered without the consent of both parties to the charter contract. The right to make further exactions upon the company under any pretext involves the power on the part of the legislature to render the grant to the company nugatory, and of no value, by impositions of like character to such an extent that the business of the company cannot be prosecuted with profit to the shareholders. The company cannot be brought within the operation of the act of March 16, 1891, without impairing the obligation of its contract with the state.

The judgment below must therefore be reversed, and the imposition which is the subject of this controversy must be vacated and set aside.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

Annie M. GLEASON
v.
Charles BOEHM.

1. The duty which this court, in Gillvon v. Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 26, declared a landlord owes to his tenants of apartments, access to which is by a common passage, he also owes to those who visit such tenants on lawful occasions.

2. He is thereby required to take reasable care to have the common halls and stairways reasonably fit for use for the passage of the tenants, but he is under no obligation to furnish means for their safe use. He is therefore under no duty (unless assumed by contract) to furnish light at night, although such light may be necessary for safe use.

3. A visitor of such a tenant passed down a stairway with which she was unfamiliar, in the dark, without waiting for a companion, who was familiar with it, or seeking from her friend a light to enable her to see the flight of steps, and using no precautions for safety but by feeling with her hands and feet. Held, that her conduct was not that of a reasonably prudent person, and that she contributed by her negligence to injuries which she received by falling down such flight.

(February 20, 1896.)

CERTIFICATION by the Hudson Circuit for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted in a suit to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence in which a verdict has been entered for plaintiff. Rule to be made absolute.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

*Headnotes by MAGIE, J.

Mr. Thomas F. Noonan, Jr., for plaintiff:

Where the owner of a building divides it into several tenements which he lets to several tenants but retains control of the halls and stairways for the common use of the occupants and those having lawful occasion to be there, he is bound to see that reasonable care and skill are exercised to render the halls and stairways reasonably fit for the uses which he invites the occupants and others to make of them, and he is responsible for any injury which others lawfully using them with due care sustain through his failure to discharge his duty.

Gillvon v. Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 26; Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 35, 37 Am. Rep. 295.

The same measure of liability for injuries sustained by negligence of the landlord extends to one socially visiting a tenant as protects the tenant himself, because the use of the hall and stairways for the purpose of enjoying such visits by such visitors is by necessary implication (where not expressly provided for) within the reasonable intent of the demise of the rooms.

Henkel v. Murr, 31 Hun, 28; Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387, 59 Am. Dec. 731; Brady v. Valentine, 3 Misc. 20; Palmer v. Dearing, 23 N. Y. 7; Howe v. Ohmart, 7 Ind. App. 32; Miller v. Hancock [1893] 2 Q. B. 177; Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295; McMartin v. Hanna, 10 Ct. Sess. Cas. 3.

It was a question for the jury to say whether or not plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Palmer v. Dearing, supra; Pinney v. Hall, 156 Mass. 225 (1892).

Mr. Charles L. Corbin for defendant.

Magie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action brought in the Hudson circuit,

NOTE.—As to the responsibility of a landlord for injuries resulting from defects in portions of a building remaining in his possession, see note to Dollard v. Roberts (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 238.

As to landlord's liability to third persons in general for condition of premises in possession of tenant, see note to Lee v. McLaughlin (Me.) 26 L. R. A. 197.

plaintiff obtained a verdict against the defendant for damages for injuries received by her under the following circumstances: On November 27, 1891, plaintiff visited a Mrs. Mitchell, who, as tenant of defendant, occupied rooms or apartments on the second story of his house. Plaintiff had never entered the house before. In going to Mrs. Mitchell's room on this occasion, she passed along a hall, and up a stairway, which were used in common by Mrs. Mitchell and others who were occupying rooms or apartments in the house as defendant's tenants. She remained in Mrs. Mitchell's room until after dark on the evening of November 28, 1891. She then left her friend's rooms, to make a visit elsewhere. She was accompanied by her sister and Mrs. Mitchell's daughter, but preceded them both in passing down the last flight of steps of the stairway which led to the hall. There was no light in the hall, and she, supposing she had arrived upon the floor of the hall, went forward, and fell from the platform of that flight, receiving in the fall the injuries for which she brought suit. There was evidence from which the jury could find that defendant had not demised to his tenants the hall and stairway, but retained control of them for their benefit. There was evidence that defendant employed one of the tenants to light, every night, one light in the upper hall, which was burning that night, and one light in the lower hall, which was not burning at the time of the accident. Whether it had been previously lighted was in question, and the preponderance of evidence was that it had been.

Had plaintiff been a tenant of the house, defendant's duty would have been that declared by this court in Gillson v. Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 26, viz., to take reasonable care to have the halls and stairways fit for use by the tenant in going to and coming from her part of the house. The court, by its instructions in this case, imposed upon the landlord a like duty in favor of one who was not a tenant but was a visitor of a tenant. No contest has been made over the propriety of this ruling of the court, and very properly. The reasons upon which the rule of duty rests in one case establish a like rule in the other. When houses are rented for dwellings which can only be reached by the use of a common passage, the necessity of such use for the beneficial enjoyment of the thing demised establishes a right to such use, and imposes an obligation upon the landlord to take reasonable care to have and maintain the passage safe for such use. But the use of such rooms for dwellings equally necessitates the use of the passage by tradesmen in delivering goods, by persons having other business with the occupant, or by those who visit him for social reasons. With respect, therefore, to all persons visiting such a tenant upon any lawful occasion, the duty of the landlord is similiar to that which he owes to the tenant. Miller v. Hancock [1893] 2 Q. B. 177; Hilsenbeck v. Guhring, 131 N. Y. 674.

At the trial, the claim of plaintiff was that defendant was guilty of a breach of the duty he owed her in two respects: (1) Because the stairway was improperly constructed, and dangerous: (2) because there was no light in the lower hall at the time of the accident. The court charged the jury that they were not to consider the first ground urged for plaintiff. This was clearly right, for there was no evidence upon which a verdict in her favor on that ground could have been supported. But upon the second point the court left the liability of the defendant to the jury, with the instructions that they were to determine whether the maintenance of a light in the hall was necessary to render plaintiff's descent reasonably safe, and, if they found such necessity, that it was defendant's duty to exercise reasonable care to maintain a light there. In my judgment, these instructions improperly enlarged defendant's duty. He was undoubtedly bound to take reasonable care to have the hall and stairway reasonably fit for the passage to and fro of his tenants and their visitors. But no duty was imposed upon him in respect to the safe use of the means of passage provided by him. If those means were such as the rule required to be provided, he had performed his duty. If the stairway was fit for use in ascending and descending, the responsibility of safely using it was upon the person using it. If, to use it safely at night, a light was requisite, he must provide it, and not the landlord. In Massachusetts it has been held that, when a landlord has rented to various tenants parts of a house to which access is obtained by a common stair, it is not his duty to remove snow and ice naturally accumulating thereon, but the tenant's duty. Woods v. Naumkeag Steam Cotton Co. 134 Mass. 357, 45 Am. Rep. 344. But for an injury resulting from an accumulation of ice from the rupture of a water pipe, which he was bound to repair, the landlord was liable. Watkins v. Goodall, 138 Mass. 533. If in this case, upon the failure of natural light, artificial light was necessary to make the descent of the stairway safe, I think it was erroneous to place the duty of providing such light upon the defendant. Hilsenbeck v. Guhring, supra. The landlord doubtless may, and probably usually does, assume the duty of providing necessary light in such cases, by contract with his tenants. There was evidence that defendant had usually provided a light in the lower hall, and had employed a person to light it. Upon this evidence, the court might have been requested to direct the jury to determine whether an implied contract to maintain such light, at least until notice of its discontinuance had been given, might not be inferred, and a corresponding duty to maintain it. But no such request was made, and we cannot consider now whether, if made, it could have been properly granted.

It is further contended by defendant that the verdict against him should be set aside on the ground that the instructions of the court in respect to the contributory negligence of plaintiff were erroneous, and on the further ground that the evidence of such negligence on her part was so conclusive that a verdict finding her to have exercised the required care for her safety ought not to stand. In my judgment, this contention must prevail, and upon both grounds. The instructions permitted the jury, in considering the plaintiff's conduct, to take into account the duty of defendant to maintain a light in the lower hall, which as before stated, was erroneous. They, moreover, omitted to direct attention to the obvious fact that if plaintiff had waited until Mrs. Mitchell's daughter, who was familiar with the stairway, had come up with her, she could have been guided safely down, and the equally obvious fact that, by returning to Mrs. Mitchell's rooms, she could have procured a light, which would have insured her safe descent. But, assuming that the instructions did not mislead the jury, I think that a verdict finding that a person descending this stairway, with which she was not familiar, in the dark, and, having at hand means to insure her safety, passing on with no precautions except the groping with her hands and feeling with her feet, of which she testified, was exercising the care which a prudent person would exercise, cannot be supported. Where a guest of a tenant in such a house went into a common hall to go to a water-closet, and, there being no light in the hall, by mistake opened the wrong door, and, passing through, fell down a flight of steps, the court of appeals of New York held that his conduct was negligent, and barred any recovery for his injuries. Hilsenbeck v. Guhring, supra.

For those reasons, the Circuit Court should be advised to make the rule to show cause absolute.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

v.
John D. SARVIS.

1. Setting fire to one's own dwelling house is not arson either at common law or under a statute making it arson to set fire to "any house of whatever name or kind," although the property is insured so that the loss may fall on the insurer.

2. Procuring the burning of one's dwelling house with intent to defraud an insurance company is not arson in the absence of a statute making it such.

NOTE.—Arson in setting fire to one's own building.

At common law.

The offense of arson may be committed by wilfully setting fire to one's own house provided a neighbor's house is thereby also burned; but if no mischief is done but to one's own it does not amount to a felony though the fire was kindled with intent to burn another's. The wilful firing of one's own house in a town is a high misdemeanor. And if a landlord sets fire to his own house which is in possession of another it is arson, for during the lease the house is the property of the tenant. 4 Bl. Com. 221.

It is not arson for a tenant to burn the house of which he is in possession under the lease unless he thereby sets fire to the house of another person. Holmes's Case, Cro. Car. 376; King v. Breeme, 1 Leach, C. L. 220; King v. Pedley, Id. 242.

It is not arson for a tenant to set fire to the house of which he is in possession. M'Neal v. Woods, 3 Blackf. 485.

It is not arson for one to burn a house which he is legally occupying. State v. Hannett, 54 Vt. 83.

One in possession under a contract to purchase cannot be guilty of arson in burning the house embraced by the contract. State v. Fish, 27 N. J. L. 323.

A husband having rightful possession of his wife's house is not guilty of arson in setting fire to it. Snyder v. People, 26 Mich. 106, 12 Am. Rep. 302.

But one in possession of a house at the instance of the overseers of the poor, without paying rent, may be guilty of arson in burning it. Gowen's Case, 2 East, P. C. 1027, 1 Leach, C. L. 246.

A landlord may be guilty of arson in setting fire to the house in possession of his tenant. Harris's Case, 2 East, P. C. 1023; Fost. C. L. 113.

It is arson for the owner to burn his building in possession of a tenant. Com. v. Elliston, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 216.

The legal owner of a house who sets fire to it while it is in possession of another person may be guilty of arson; while its occupant by a like act will not become so chargeable. State v. Toole, 29 Conn. 342, 76 Am. Dec. 602.

Setting fire to a house in close proximity to others may be a misdemeanor. Scofield's Case, 2 East, 1023, Cald. 397; Properts' Case, 2 East, P. C. 1030.

And if other houses are burned, the one setting the fire will be guilty at least of a misdemeanor. Isaac's Case, 2 East, P. C. 1031.

One in possession under a lease is not guilty of arson in burning property. Sullivan v. State, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 175.

At common law a person could not be guilty of arson in setting fire to and in burning the house while in the lawful possession of it, without regard to the question of ownership. Garrett v. State, 109 Ind. 527.

But in Rex v. Ball, 1 Moody, C. C. 30, one occupying a room in a house was indicted for setting fire to the house.

One in possession of premises cannot be guilty of arson in setting fire to them, although they are insured and being copyhold, he has surrendered them to the use of a third person, who has not, however, been admitted to possession. King v. Spalding, 1 Leach, C. L. 218.

So a servant who sets fire to his master's house by the master's procurement for the purpose of defrauding the insurers is not guilty of arson. It is not arson to procure one's own house to be burned and the guilt of the servant is only coextensive with that of the master. State v. Haynes, 66 Me. 307, 22 Am. Rep. 569; Com. v. Makely, 131 Mass. 421.

But in a Tennessee case it was said that it was a misdemeanor at common law to burn one's own house for the purpose of injuring or defrauding an insurer. Roberts v. State, 7 Coldw. 359.

A woman cannot be guilty of arson in burning her husband's house. Rex v. March, 1 Moody, C. C. 182.

So, to charge one with having set fire to his own house is not slander unless it is intended to impute that the act was done under such circumstances as would have been a crime. Sweetapple v. Jesse, 5 Barn. & Ad. 27, 2 Nev. & M. 36; Bloss v. Tobey, 2 Pick. 320.

The indictment must state that the property burned belonged to another. People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 80; State v. Lyon, 12 Conn. 487.

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Horry County entered upon trial of an indictment for arson, the state appealing from the quashing of one count of the indictment, and defendant appealing from the refusal to quash the other count. Reversed on defendant's appeal, and affirmed on the State's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. M. Johnson for the State.

Messrs. W. D. Johnson, J. W. Johnson, and C. P. Quattlebaum for defendant.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment in this case contained two counts, the first charging that the defendant "did feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously set fire to, and cause fire to be set to, a certain house, to wit, a dwelling house, there situate, of one John D. Sarvis, in which the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Association then and there had an interest, to wit, a policy of insurance, and by the kindling of such fire the aforesaid dwelling house was then and there feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously burned and consumed, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." The second count of the indictment charged that the said John D. Sarvis, "with intent to defraud the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Association, a corporation under the laws of said state, which then has [had?] issued a policy of insurance on the dwelling house hereinafter named,

Under the Vermont statute the malicious burning by the owner of a house in possession of his tenant is arson. Com. v. Erskine, 8 Gratt. 627.

Under the Texas statute it is arson for a landlord to burn his property in possession of a tenant. Tuller v. State, 8 Tex. App. 501.

But a tenant who tears down a building erected by himself on the leased premises and burns the materials from which it was composed, before the expiration of the lease, cannot be convicted in Texas under an indictment charging him with burning a building of the landlord. Mulligan v. State, 25 Tex. App. 199.

It is not arson under the Tennessee Code to burn one's own house. Roberts v. State, 7 Coldw. 359.

Under the Ohio statute a tenant may be guilty of arson in burning buildings of which he is in possession under the lease. Allen v. State, 10 Ohio St. 287.

In People v. Gates, 15 Wend. 159, the opinion is given that the New York statute did not intend to make it arson to burn one's own house.

And in People v. Henderson, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 560, the dictum in that case was carried into a decision, and it was held that a person cannot be guilty of arson in the first degree by setting fire to his own house.

But it has been decided that under the New York statute one may commit arson by burning his own dwelling. Shepherd v. People, 19 N. Y. 537.

So, burning one's own house in such a manner that it sets fire to the house of another will render one guilty of arson. Hennessey v. People, 21 How. Pr. 239.

The Indiana statute has made arson a crime against the property as well as against the possession, and now a husband in possession, with his wife, of her property, may be guilty of arson if he sets the property on fire. But even under that statute the dwelling house must be the property of another person than defendant. Garrett v. State, 109 Ind. 527.

In California a tenant may be guilty of crime in burning property of his landlord. People v. Simpson, 50 Cal. 304.

To injure insurer.

Under the Canadian statute wilfully and maliciously setting fire to a house with intent to injure or defraud an insurance company is indictable. Queen v. Bryans, 12 U. C. C. P. 163.

It seems to be an indictable offense in England to set fire to a house for the purpose of defrauding an insurance company. Reg. v. Gray, 4 Fost. & F. 1102.

The English statute will support an indictment for setting fire to a house with intent to defraud and injure an insurance company. Rex v. Gilson, Russ. & R. C. C. 138.

But charging a person with having set fire to his house and burned it up is not slander, even in a state making it felony to burn a house with intent to injure the insurer, if there is nothing to show that the person making the statement knew that the house was insured. Frank v. Dunning, 38 Wis. 270.

H. P. F.

did feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously counsel, hire, procure, and command one Alva Sarvis to feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously set fire to a certain dwelling house of the said John D. Sarvis, there situate, and by the kindling of said fire aforesaid, so set as aforesaid by the said Alva Sarvis, upon the hiring, commanding, and procurement of the said John D. Sarvis, as aforesaid, the aforesaid dwelling house was then and there feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously burned and consumed; the said policy of insurance being then and there of force, outstanding, in favor of the said John D. Sarvis, for a large sum of money, to wit, for the sum of $550; and so the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, do say that the said John D. Sarvis then and there, in the manner and by the means aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously did commit the crime of arson, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." A motion was made before his honor, Judge Ernest Gary, to quash the indictment, when his honor ruled that the motion must be granted as to the first count in the indictment, but must be refused as to the second count. From this ruling both parties have appealed, the state alleging error in holding the first count bad, and the defendant alleging error in holding the second count good.

I propose, first, to consider the appeal on behalf of the state, which raises the question as to the validity of the first count in the indictment, in which the defendant is charged with arson in "feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously" burning his own dwelling house. There can be no doubt that a person cannot be convicted, at common law, of the crime of arson in burning his own dwelling house, and this I understand to be conceded; for the definition of that offense, as given in 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 8, is "the malicious burning of another's house," and this is sustained by citations in the notes from standard authorities. And, as is said by the same author, in § 12: "Arson is an offense against the security of the habitation, rather than the property. When, therefore, we say that the house burned must be another's to occupy, consequently, at common law, a man cannot commit arson of his own house, even when it is insured,"—citing King v. Spalding, 1 Leach, C. L. 218, 2 East, P. C. 1025, and Proberts' Case, 2 East, P. C. 1030, with other cases, to which may be added Breeme's Case, Id. 1026, and Isaac's Case, Id. 1031. See also Snyder v. People, 26 Mich. 106, 12 Am. Rep. 302, where Judge Cooley used this language: "Arson is an offense against the habitation, and regards the possession rather than the property. . . . The house, therefore, must not be described as the house of the owner of the fee, if in fact at the time another has the actual occupancy, but it must be described as the dwelling house of him whose dwelling it then is." In that case the indictment charged the defendant with burning the dwelling house of Mary A. Snyder, who was, at the time, the wife of the defendant; and the syllabus of the case, which is fully sustained by the opinion of the court, reads as follows: "A husband living with his wife, and having a rightful possession, jointly with her, of a dwelling house which she owns and they both occupy, is not guilty of arson, by the common law, in burning such dwelling house; and the rule is not changed by a statute securing to the wife the separate property." From these authorities, as well as others that might be cited, it is very obvious that the gist of the common-law offense of arson is the injury of the habitation, and not of the property constituting the habitation; and, if a person voluntarily chooses to destroy his own habitation, either by fire or otherwise, he does no such unlawful act as would constitute arson. Indeed, if the building burned is his own property, I do not see that, in any sense, his act can be regarded as unlawful, inasmuch as a person may do with his own as he pleases, provided, in so doing, he does not injure the property of his neighbor. If, however, a person sets fire to his own dwelling house, with intent to burn the dwelling house of his neighbor, and the house of his neighbor takes fire and is burned, it is quite possible that he may be convicted of arson. But, as there is no such allegation in this indictment, it is unnecessary to consider further such an hypothesis. But if a person sets fire to his own dwelling house with an intent simply to injure or destroy his neighbor's property,—not his habitation,—he certainly could not be convicted of arson, although he might be responsible for the damages done to his neighbor's property.

It is contended, however, that the common law in respect to arson has been changed by statute, and now a person may be indicted for arson in wilfully and maliciously burning his own dwelling house. The statute relied on for this purpose is incorporated in § 140 of the Criminal Statutes (2 Rev. Stat. p. 311), which reads as follows: "The wilful and malicious setting fire to or burning any house, of whatever name or kind, within the curtilage or common inclosure of any house or room, wherein persons habitually sleep, whereby any such dwelling house or sleeping apartment shall be endangered; also the wilful and malicious setting fire to or burning any courthouse, or other public building, whether owned by the state or a corporation or individuals, and kept or left for public meetings or exhibitions, barn, stable, coachhouse, storehouse, ginhouse, warehouse, grist or saw mill, railroad depot, coach or cotton factory, or other house used for manufacturing purposes, of whatever name or kind, or setting fire to or burning any house habitually used for public religious worship, shall be deemed arson, whether the setting fire to or burning be in the day or night time." The section proceeds to prescribe the punishment for such offense. It seems to me that the sole object of the statutory provision above quoted which was originally enacted in 1861 (12 Stat. at L. 862) was simply to enlarge the character of the houses which could be subjects of arson, and not to make any other change in the recognized definition of that offense. At common law the only buildings which could be the subjects of arson were dwelling houses or other structures appurtenant thereto and within the curtilage thereof. The language used in the statute, "any house of whatever name or kind," clearly implies that such was the purpose of the statute. At common law the character of the houses which could be the subjects of arson was limited to dwelling houses, or houses appurtenant thereto and within the curtilage; but, by statute, the class of houses which could be the subject of arson is enlarged so as to embrace "any house of whatever name or kind, within the curtilage or common inclosure of a dwelling house, or within the curtilage or common inclosure of any house or room wherein persons habitually sleep, whereby any such dwelling house or sleeping apartment shall be endangered," whether the same be appurtenant to such dwelling house or sleeping apartment, or not; so that the burning of a store or livery stable, which was in no wise appurtenant to the dwelling house or sleeping apartment, if within the common inclosure, whereby such dwelling house or sleeping apartment would be endangered, would constitute the crime of arson. And then the statute proceeds to enlarge still further the class of houses which would be the subject of arson so as to embrace court-houses or any other public buildings, railroad depots, and the various other houses designated in the statute. The words "any house," relied on in the argument, especially when followed by the words "of whatever name or kind," certainly cannot be construed as designed to so totally change the definition of the crime of arson as to subject a person who burns his own house, located in the center of a field, too far distant from the houses of another to endanger them in the slightest degree, to the punishment of arson, no matter what may be the motive of such person for destroying his own property.

As to the allegations in the first count of the indictment with respect to the so-called "interest" of the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Association in the dwelling house alleged to have been burned by the defendant, I am at a loss to conceive what possible effect it could possibly have upon the validity of this count of the indictment. After alleging that the defendant did set fire to a certain house, to wit, "a dwelling house there situate, of one John D. Sarvis," these words follow: "In which the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Association then and there had an interest, to wit, a policy of insurance." This certainly does not amount to an allegation that the building which was burned was the dwelling house or habitation of the insurance company, for, on the contrary, the distinct allegation is that such building was the dwelling house of the defendant. And the further allegation that the insurance company had an interest therein, even if not contradicted by the explanation of such interest, would amount to nothing: for, even if the insurance company did have an interest in the property (which I do not think it had), that would not affect the question, as it was held in Spalding's Case, 1 Leach, C. L. 218, extracted from 2 East, P. C. 1025, that a mortgagor in possession burning his own house, could not be convicted of arson, either at common law or under the statute (9 Geo. I. chap. 22), which is not of force here. Besides, there is no allegation, in the first count of the indictment, that the defendant burned his own house with intent to defraud the insurance company. But, even if there was such an allegation in this count, I do not see how, in the absence of any statute upon the subject, it could affect the present inquiry. In England there is a statute making it felony, without benefit of clergy, for a person to burn his own house with intent to defraud "His Majesty or any of His Majesty's subjects, or any body corporate," and the case of Rex v. Gilson, Russ. & R. C. C. 138, was a prosecution under that statute, in which defendant was charged with burning his own house with intent to defraud an insurance company. Similar statutes have been enacted in several of the states of this Union; but, so far as I am informed, we have no such statute in this state, and, in the absence of any such statute, I am unable to see how the fact that a person has burned his own house with intent to defraud an insurance company renders him liable to an indictment for arson or any other felony. The fact that it has been found necessary, in England and several of the states of this Union, to enact special statutes to cover a case of this kind, affords an additional reason for the correctness of my view. I agree, therefore, with the circuit judge in holding that the defendant could not be convicted of arson under the first count in the indictment.

Coming, then, to the question presented by the appeal on behalf of the defendant, it seems to me that it follows, necessarily, from what has already been said, that the second count in the indictment is also fatally defective. Without going over the argument already presented to show that it is no offense against the criminal law for one to burn his own dwelling house, even for the purpose of defrauding an insurance company which has issued a policy thereon, it will be sufficient to cite the case of State v. Haynes, 66 Me. 307, 22 Am. Rep. 569, which, in principle, is so much like the case in hand as to justify liberal quotations therefrom. In that case the defendant, who was a servant of Mrs. Ingraham, was indicted for arson, under Rev. Stat. chap. 119, § 1, for feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously burning, in the night-time, the dwelling house of Mrs. Ingraham. The evidence tended to prove, and the jury must have found, that the dwelling house of Mrs. Ingraham was burned in the night-time, under the following circumstances: The house was insured by Mrs. Ingraham. Being insured, Mrs. Ingraham, her daughter, and the defendant conspired together to burn the house, for the purpose of obtaining the insurance. . . . The question presented for determination is whether upon the facts the indictment can be sustained under Rev. Stat. chap. 119, § 1, which is in these words: 'Whoever wilfully and maliciously sets fire to the dwelling house of another, or to any building adjoining thereto, or to any building owned by himself or another, with the intent to burn such dwelling house, and it is thereby burnt, in the night-time, shall be punished with death.' . . . In some states the common law has been modified, as in New York, where the wilfully setting fire to, or burning any inhabited dwelling in the night-time is made arson, so that the offense may be committed by one's burning his own dwelling house. So in England the British Parliament has so modified the law in relation to arson as to render it immaterial whether the house burned be that of the offender himself, or a third person. Shepherd v. People, 19 N. Y. 537; Stat. 1 Vict. chap. 89, § 3; Rex v. Ball, 1 Moody, C. C. 30. . . . If Mrs. Ingraham had burnt her own dwelling, she would not have been amenable to the penalties prescribed by § 1. The fire was set at her instance and for her supposed benefit. The servant obeying cannot be more guilty than the master commanding. The precise question before us arose in Tennessee (Roberts v. State, 7 Coldw. 359), and it was there held that it was not arson to procure one's own house to be burned, and that the guilt of the agent was only coextensive with the guilt of the principal. It is not arson for a man to burn his own house, or to procure it to be done, for the purpose of defrauding an insurance company." Upon the same principles, it is clear that the second count in the indictment fails to state such facts as would constitute the offense of arson, notwithstanding the fact that, in the second count, the defendant is charged with having procured the burning of his own dwelling house "with intent to defraud the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Association" which had issued a policy of insurance on said dwelling house, for the reason that there is no statute in this state, as there is in England, as well as in some of the other states in the Union, making it a felony to burn one's own dwelling house with intent to defraud an insurance company. If, therefore, as has been shown, a person cannot be charged with arson in setting fire to his own dwelling house, for the reason that it is not unlawful for a person to burn or otherwise destroy his own property, unless in so doing he injures or destroys the property of his neighbor, it is difficult to conceive how he could be accessory to any crime when the act is done by another by his own procurement. If it is no crime for him to do the act himself, it cannot be to procure or command it done by another. It is true that there are cases in which one may be accessory before the fact to a crime committed by another, which the party charged may be incapable of committing; as, for example, a female may be an accessory before the fact to the crime of rape, committed by a man upon another female. But in such a case the party charged as accessory is incapable physically of doing the act which constitutes the crime, and if she procures the act to be done by one who is physically capable the law regards the act as done by herself. Still, even in such a case, the act done must be a crime in the person who actually does the act; and, if it is not, then there can be no accessory. So that, in this case, if it would be no crime in John D. Sarvis to burn his own house in his own proper person, he could not be accessory before the fact if the act of burning was done through the agency of another, by his command or procurement. I cannot, therefore, agree with the circuit judge in holding that the second count in the indictment was good, but, on the contrary, think that both counts were fatally defective.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Judge that the first count in the indictment be quashed must be affirmed, and his judgment sustaining the second count must be reversed, and that the indictment be quashed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Eugene PELTIER, Appt.,
v.
BRADLEY, DANN, & CARRINGTON COMPANY.

(67 Conn. 42.)

1. One who drives a team to the left of the road in order to stop there does not thereby assume the responsibility of an unusual and the highest degree of care to avoid a collision with another vehicle which attempts to keep to the right in passing.

2. The rider of a bicycle has not an absolute right to pass on the right-hand side in meeting a truck which is turning toward that side to the curb of the street, nor can he assume that the driver must turn out for him, but is bound to exercise the same degree of care which the law requires of the driver of the truck to avoid a collision.

3. The driver of a truck for the conveyance of goods is not obliged to turn to the right on meeting a vehicle for the conveyance of persons, under Gen. Stat. §§ 2689 and 2690, as the statute applies only to vehicles for the conveyance of persons.

4. An exception to a finding of fact as to negligence when there is no uncertainty as to the rule by which it is to be governed, but only as to what the conduct was, constitutes no ground of appeal under the act of 1893.

(November 22, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for New Haven County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant in driving a truck against plaintiff who was riding a bicycle along a public street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lucius P. Deming, J. Birney Tuttle, and John F. Wynne, for appellant:

The facts do not justify the finding, and the question of negligence in this case is a question of law.

The plaintiff saw the defendant when he was 400 feet away, and watched him as he passed (came) up the street. He, the plaintiff, was on the right-hand side of the street. At 70 feet west of the elevator door he turned out and passed a team and resumed his old position 4 or 5 feet from the curb.

Practically the plaintiff traveled 400 feet in a straight line, 4 or 5 feet from the curb, and he was 4 or 5 feet from the curb when the accident happened. Here was a consistent course of conduct. By it Scoville had a right to presume what would be the continuing conduct of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff had watched Scoville 400 feet, during which time Scoville had not changed his course; he had a right to presume that he would continue to drive as he had been driving.

At the corner of State street, 70 feet west of the elevator door, the defendant's truck was to the left of the center of the street.

The center of the street is 11 feet 6 inches from the curb.

The truck is 6 feet wide from hub to hub. Then from the curb to the left hub was 5 feet, allowing 6 inches between the right hub and the center of the street. Scoville saw the plaintiff when he, Scoville, was near the elevator door, and the plaintiff 12 or 15 feet away.

In driving 70 feet Scoville had changed his course 12 inches at most, a change so slight that the most observant could not notice it. In fact, to this point, neither party had changed position.

It is not claimed that the plaintiff changed his course. Scoville had no need to change his course, i. e., "draw in to the curb;" the street was narrow; he was on the left side; when he reached the desired point a change of 4 or 5 feet would bring him to the curb.

Scoville swears: "I should say he [plaintiff] was 12 or 15 feet from the horse's head when I first saw him. I supposed he knew what he was about and had room to go through there. As soon as I saw he was going through I pulled my horse to the right."

Again: "The wagon was nearer the curb when the accident occurred than it was when I first saw the bicycle."

The defendant's team was 3½ feet from the curb when it hit the plaintiff.

These admitted facts show that Scoville was driving through Court street heedless of his surroundings. When near his stopping place he looked up suddenly, saw the plaintiff 12 or 15 feet in front of him, coming towards him, and with the recklessness of sudden fright "pulled" his horse to the left instead of the right and the accident occurred.

Within a space of 12 or 15 feet Scoville drew in to the curb from 5 feet to 3½ feet. This is his own testimony, and it harmonizes with the testimony of the plaintiff: "As I came up head to the wagon and tried to pass it, the driver, without any consideration of my position, turned in his horse."

Scoville was to his left of the center of the street, and being in this position he should have exercised unusual care; and his failure to see an approaching vehicle until within 15 feet was gross carelessness.

Knowles v. Crampton, 55 Conn. 344.

The plaintiff had a right to be on the street, for the bicycle is a vehicle, and entitled to all the rights and privileges which the law extends to vehicles.

The plaintiff was riding on the side where he should be before meeting defendant's team, and followed the law when he attempted to pass.

Gen. Stat. §§ 2689, 2690.

The defendant was not where he should have been. He attempted to pass plaintiff contrary to statute. The defendant occupied his position only permissibly and was charged with entire responsibility for any injury to others arising from the fact that he was out of place.

Conn. Gen. Stat. § 2691.

Messrs. Case, Ely, & Case, for appellee:

The court has found that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and that Scoville, the defendant's agent, was not guilty of negligence, and the question of negligence is a question of fact.

Park v. O'Brien, 23 Conn. 339; Dexter v. McCready, 54 Conn. 171; Fiske v. Forsyth Dyeing, L. & B. Co. 57 Conn. 118.

Plaintiff must show that he was not guilty of negligence and that the defendant was. Having failed to do this, judgment was rightly rendered for the defendant.

Park v. O'Brien, supra.

He alone should suffer, for the injury would not have happened had it not been for his own negligence.

Bennett v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 57 Conn. 422.

There was then no error in finding the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence and the defendant's driver not guilty of negligence so far as the law is concerned, and so far as the facts are concerned the court will not review them.

Styles v. Tyler, 64 Conn. 432; Curtis v. Bradley, 65 Conn. 99, 28 L. R. A. 143.

There is no law which holds that it is negligence per se for a driver to have his team on the left-hand side of the center of the traveled path, and the plaintiff is not relieved from ordinary care of himself on that account.

Brooks v. Hart, 14 N. H. 307; Daniels v. Clegg, 28 Mich. 32; Wrinn v. Jones, 111 Mass. 360.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's main contention is that whoever drives a team upon what to him is the left-hand side of the road thereby assumes the responsibility of exercising an unusual and the highest degree of care to avoid a collision with any other vehicle which he may have occasion to pass, and which is being kept on what to it is the right-hand side of the road. Such is not the law. It is necessary and proper for any driver who is about to stop for the purpose of going upon land or into buildings situated on what to him is the left-hand side of the road to shape his course in that direction; and he is bound simply to exercise ordinary and reasonable care with reference to such teams as he may encounter. Whether such care was exercised by the defendant's driver, under the circumstances of the case, was a pure question of fact, on which the finding of the court below is conclusive. Wrinn v. Jones, 111 Mass. 360; Fisk v. Forsyth Dyeing, L. & B. Co. 57 Conn. 118.

It is equally conclusive in charging the plaintiff with contributory negligence. He, too, was bound to exercise the same degree of care which the law required of Scoville, the defendant's driver. It was not his absolute right to pass between the defendant's team and the southern curb of the street, or to assume that Scoville must and would turn out for him. The defendant's right to use its elevator, and to place its truck as close to it as it could, was as perfect as that of the plaintiff to ride through the street. Each party was equally bound to use his rights so as not to injure the other.

We have no statutory rule at variance with these principles. Gen. Stat. §§ 2689, 2690, provide that, when the drivers of any vehicles for the conveyance of persons shall meet each other in the public highway, each shall turn to the right, and slacken his pace, so as to give half the traveled path, if practicable, and a fair and equal opportunity to pass, to the other; and that the driver of any such vehicle who shall, by neglecting to conform to these requirements, drive against another vehicle, shall be liable in treble damages for any injury thereby done, and, if the injury were done designedly, forfeit not exceeding $100 to the state; such damages, if the driver is unable to pay them, to be recoverable of the owner of the vehicle by writ of scire facias. The action before us was not brought upon the statute, and could not have been, since that gives a remedy only against the driver, or, in case of his inability to respond, the owner, of a vehicle for the conveyance of persons. The rule which it lays down is limited to vehicles of the same description. The driver of a truck for the conveyance of goods, when he meets on the road a vehicle for the conveyance of persons, is not under any statutory obligation to turn to the right. It may be reasonable, and, if so, necessary, that he should do so; but this depends solely on what should be the conduct, under the circumstances of the occasion, of a driver of ordinary skill and prudence.

The plaintiff filed written exceptions to certain of the findings of fact made by the court below, and to its refusal to make certain findings of fact which he had requested, and the evidence claimed by each party to be material to such questions of fact has been certified up, and made part of the record, under chapter 174 of the Public Acts of 1893. This act was repealed in 1895, but by Gen. Stat. § 1, such repeal did not affect actions then pending, of which the present suit was one. By the reasons of appeal founded upon these exceptions, the plaintiff asks this court to compare the evidence as to several of the circumstances preceding or attending the collision between the bicycle and the truck, with the findings of the trial court as to what those circumstances were. There was evidence in respect to some of these circumstances tending to support the plaintiff's view of them. There was evidence in regard to all of them tending to support the views taken by the trial court. Negligence becomes a question of law when the case turns upon the standard to be applied to measure the care due from the party whose conduct is the subject of consideration, but seldom, if ever, when it turns on what his conduct in fact was and there is no uncertainty as to the rule by which it was to be governed. Farrell v. Waterbury Horse R. Co. 60 Conn. 239, 246. The case at bar is one of the latter description, and the plaintiff's exceptions to the finding constituted no ground of appeal under the act of 1893. Styles v. Tyler, 64 Conn. 432; Meriden Sav. Bank v. Wellington, 64 Conn. 553. Whatever points of law he was entitled to raise were fairly presented by the state of facts found by the trial court.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

In this judgment the other Judges concurred.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY of New York, Appt.,
v.
John D. WATERMAN, etc., Admr., of James B. Marshall, Deceased.

(161 Ill. 632.)

1. Death from asphyxiation by illuminating gas while the insured was asleep is not within a clause of an accident insurance policy providing that the insurance does not cover "injuries, fatal or otherwise, resulting from poison, or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled."
2. The word "absorbed," in a provision of an accident insurance policy that it does not cover injuries from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise absorbed or inhaled, refers only to the process of absorption by sucking up or imbibing through the pores of the body.
3. The words "absorbed or inhaled," in a provision of an accident insurance policy that it does not cover injuries from anything accidentally or otherwise absorbed or inhaled, implies a voluntary and intelligent act as distinguished from an involuntary and unconscious act.
4. Objections not raised by the briefs in the Illinois appellate court cannot be renewed or made for the first time in the supreme court.

(May 12, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Second District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Winnebago County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William G. Challis and Garver & Fisher, for appellant:

The death of the assured did not occur from a cause which makes it liable under its contract of assurance.

Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. ed. 308; Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. 164 Mass. 170; Richardson v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 843; Menneiley v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 72 Hun, 477.

The policy constituted the only relation between the parties. If it does not by a fair and natural import of its provisions give a right of action, then the plaintiff has no right of action. The defendant has a right to limit its liability.

Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, supra; Stettauer v. Hamlin, 97 Ill. 312; Supreme Council R. T. of T. v. Curd, 111 Ill. 284; Tipton v. People, 156 Ill. 241 (1895); Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. supra.

The exception in the case at bar is broad and sweeping. It is not a death resulting from something inhaled by mistake, that is, "to take one thing for another," but injuries fatal resulting from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled.

Haight v. McVeagh, 69 Ill. 624.

Messrs. Arthur H. Frost and Robert G. McEvoy, for appellee:

The means which accomplished the death of Marshall were external, violent, and accidental, but he did not inhale gas. He accidentally breathed the gas. Had the policy intended to cover this cause, it could have been written that the company would not be responsible for death occasioned by gas.

Healey v. Mutual Acci. Asso. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L. R. A. 371.

Gas was not inhaled within the meaning of that word as it appears in the policy.

Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L. R. A. 443.

If there is any ambiguity or uncertainty in the words of a policy, the construction most favorable to the insured must be given.

The interpretation to be given a clause can often be determined by the meaning and scope of clauses which surround it. Noscitur a sociis is a rule of law as well as a rule of ethics.

Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 218.

Conditions providing for disabilities and forfeitures are to receive, when the intent is doubtful, a strict construction against those for whose benefit they are introduced.

A policy must be liberally construed in favor of the assured so as not to defeat, without a plain necessity, his claim to the indemnity which in making the insurance it was his object to secure.

May, Ins. 2d ed. § 175; Healey v. Mutual Acci. Asso. 133 Ill. 561 9 L. R. A. 371; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Scammon, 130 Ill. 644; Hoffman v. Ætna F. Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 415, 88 Am. Dec. 337; Palmer v. Warren Ins. Co. 1 Story, 360; Crossing v. Scudamore, 2 Lev. 9.

The means of death were external and violent.

Gas is not a poison within the meaning of the policy.

United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Newman, supra.

Even if injury occurred while intoxicated, it must be shown that deceased had drunk enough to disturb the physical or mental faculties so that they are no longer in the natural or normal condition.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The accident insurance policy in suit in this cause was issued by the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York on June 14, 1891, to James B. Marshall, the intestate of appellee, insuring him in the sum of $5,000 against death through external, violent, and accidental means for the term of twelve months ending June 14, 1892. The policy also made provision for a weekly indemnity in case of bodily injury through like means, but not causing death. The policy was afterwards renewed for an additional term of one year from June 14, 1892. The intestate was asphyxiated by illuminating gas in the Northwestern Hotel at Aurora, Illinois, on the night of December 5, 1892. He was found dead in bed on the morning of December 6, and the room was full of gas. At the trial there was evidence tending to prove that the gas fixtures in the room were defective; and there was also evidence tending to prove that the deceased was intoxicated at the time of the accident, and that his death was attributable to such intoxication. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and a number of written propositions were submitted to it by appellant to be held as law in the decision of the case, but they were all refused and exceptions taken. The finding and judgment were for the plaintiff below, and that judgment was affirmed in the appellate court.

The principal defenses relied on by appellant are based upon provisions in the policy which read as follows: "This insurance does not cover disappearances, nor war risk, nor voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger; nor injuries, fatal or otherwise, resulting from poison, or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled; nor injuries, fatal or otherwise, received while, or in consequence of having been under the influence of, or affected by, nor resulting directly or indirectly from, intoxicants, anæsthetics, narcotics, sunstroke, freezing, vertigo, sleepwalking, fits, hernia, or any disease or bodily infirmity." One ground of defense is that, since the policy expressly states that the insurance does not cover injuries resulting from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled, and the deceased came to his death by means of the illuminating gas which he inhaled while asleep, therefore, according to the true intent and meaning of the contract, appellant is not liable to the administrator for the sum of $5,000 stipulated to be paid in case of the death of his intestate as the result of external, violent, and accidental means. In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Dunlap, 160 Ill. 642, this court held that drinking carbolic acid by mistake for peppermint is not within a clause of an accident insurance exempting the company from liability for injuries or death from "taking poison," as such word means the voluntary intentional taking of poison, and do not include cases of accidental poisoning by mistake, but do include injuries or death from voluntarily taking poison without any suicidal intent. And this court in its opinion referred with approval to the decision of the court of appeals of New York in Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 32 L. R. A. 443, and said: "We think the rule established by the court of appeals of New York one better calculated to carry out the true intention of the parties when the contract of insurance was entered into, and one, too, more nearly in harmony with the current of authority bearing on the question." In the Paul Case, thus referred to, the policy provided that the insurance should not extend to any death or disability which may have been caused by the taking of poison, contact with poisonous substances, or inhaling of gas, and it appeared that the insured was found dead in bed in his room at an hotel, and that the gas had in some way been turned on, and his death caused by breathing the atmosphere of the room filled with gas; and it was held that the death was not caused by "the inhaling of gas" within the meaning of the policy, and that those words applied only to a voluntary and intelligent action on the part of the insured, such as in medical or surgical treatment for dental work, or with a suicidal purpose. And in the subsequent case of Bacon v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617, the court of appeals approved the decision in the Paul Case, and said, "Upon the question decided the case is conclusive, and we have no disposition to alter our views as expressed therein." In Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 144 Pa. 79, 13 L. R. A. 661, where there was a condition that the insurance should not cover death or injury resulting from or attributable, partially or wholly, to inhalation of gas, and the insured went down into a well to make repairs on a pump, and in a short time was found in the well, dead, from asphyxia, caused by poisonous gas at the bottom of the well, it was held that the condition in the policy against "inhalation of gas" contemplated a voluntary and intelligent act by the insured,—not an involuntary and unconscious act, and was inoperative to relieve the company from liability See also Metropolitan Acci. Asso. v. Froiland, (opinion filed at Ottawa on March 28, 1896), 161 Ill. 30.

It is urged that the exception in the case at bar is broader and more sweeping than the words found in the cases heretofore decided, the words here being, "poison or anything accidentally or otherwise absorbed or inhaled," and that these words necessarily include every possible way by which irrespirable gases can be got into the human system so as to cause death. The additional word "absorbed," found in the language last above quoted, has no application to the case before us, for that word manifestly has reference only to the process of absorption by sucking up or imbibing through the pores of the body. The claim made is not well grounded if the correctness of the point decided in the cases we have mentioned be conceded. That point, as we understand it, is that the word "inhaling," or "inhalation," or "inhaled," as used in exceptions contained in these policies of life or accident insurance, implies a voluntary and intelligent act as distinguished from an involuntary and unconscious act. Read in the light of the decisions, the words now in question do not mean otherwise than if they explicitly read "poison or anything accidentally or otherwise consciously and by an act of volition drawn into the system by inspiration." This view is fully supported by a late decision of the court of appeals of New York. That court had before it Menneiley v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 148 N. Y. 596, 31 L. R. A. 686, the case of a provision in an accident policy that it does not insure against death or disablement from anything accidentally inhaled. The insured had died at night of asphyxia, caused by involuntarily and accidentally breathing into his lungs, while asleep, illuminating gas, which had accidentally escaped into his room at an hotel. It was held that the case was not distinguishable in principle from the Paul Case, and that the provision in the policy did not relieve the insurer from liability. And we may add that this Menneiley Case, which had then just been published, was cited by this court with approval in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Dunlap, supra.

Appellant claims that to place the construction we have upon the policy is not to enforce the contract made by the parties, but to make a new contract for them. This can hardly be so. Appellant is a New York corporation, and made and dated its contract in the city of New York,—and this was done several years after the decision in the Paul Case by the court of last resort in that state. It must be presumed that it was then fully advised of that decision, and knew, when it entered into the contract now in suit, what its liabilities were under the agreement that it made. The policy in suit contains a stipulation that the insurance does not cover injuries, fatal or otherwise, received while or in consequence of having been under the influence of, or affected by, nor resulting, directly or indirectly, from, intoxicants. In its brief and argument prepared for this court, all that appellant says in regard to this provision is this: "While the appellate court finds the fact of intoxication against us, we submit that it was error to refuse the propositions on this point, and respectfully refer to clause 2 of our brief in the appellate court, hereto annexed, where this point is considered." Turning to said clause 2, we find that the matter of intoxication is neither mentioned nor discussed therein otherwise than as a contested question of fact, and we also find that neither in that clause nor elsewhere in the brief is there any mention of or reference to any proffered propositions relating to the subject of intoxication. And we further find that the appellate court, in rendering its judgment, passed upon no such propositions of law. If any such refused propositions are to be found in the record, it must be considered, as we have held in numerous cases, that appellant waived in the appellate court all objections to the rulings of the trial court thereon, and cannot renew such objections or make them for the first time in this court.

It is further claimed that there was no compliance with the condition of the policy that affirmative proof of death must be furnished to the company within two months from time of death. It is a sufficient answer to say that there is evidence in the record tending to show a waiver by appellant of proofs of death; that the judgments of the circuit and appellate courts conclusively establish the fact of such waiver; and that no propositions of law were either held or refused which stated what would or could not in law constitute a waiver.

We find no error in the record for which the judgment can be reversed. It is therefore affirmed.

Cartwright, J., having heard this case in the appellate court, took no part here.

1. A ballot for school directors at an election to choose one for a full term of three years and one to fill a vacancy for one year cannot be counted when it contains the names of two persons without anything to designate which office either is intended for.
2. The designation of the office to be filled which a ballot must show, under 1 Starr & C. Stat. 1008, §§ 52, 53, sufficiently appears, at least as to the person named for the long term, upon a ballot containing only the names of two persons with the words "long term" following one name without any other words to designate the office, when the election is held only for school directors, one to be chosen for a long term and one for a vacancy.
3. A ballot containing two names with the words "long term" after one of them, cast at an election which is held only for the election of school directors, one for a long term and one to fill a vacancy, can be counted at least for the person named for the long term, although there is a failure to designate by express words the office for which the other person was named.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Clark County Court in favor of contestant in a proceeding to contest the alleged election of defendant as a school director. Reversed.

Statement by Carter, J.:

This proceeding was instituted by John Kuykendall and William M. Mott in the county court of Clark county, to contest the election of Samuel Page and William D. Rollings as

NOTE.—The above case seems to be without any very close precedent, and it is apparently the first to construe the statutory provision for the designation upon the ballot of the office to be filled.

As to the question how far statutory provisions as to ballots are mandatory, see Re Contested Election of School Directors (Pa.) 27 L. R. A. 234; Stackpole v. Hallahan (Mont.) 28 L. R. A. 502; Moyer v. Van de Vanter (Wash.) 29 L. R. A. 670, and Parker v. Orr (Ill.) 30 L. R. A. 227.

school directors of district No. 7, in township 12, range 11, in said county. The election was held on the 20th day of April, 1895, for the purpose of electing one director for the full term of three years, and one for the term of one year, to fill a vacancy. There were four candidates at said election,—Kuykendall, Page, Mott, and Rollings,—and sixty-three votes were cast. The poll book filed with the township treasurer contains a certificate reading as follows:

Returns of this Election.

Names of Persons.	Whole number of votes cast.
S. P. Page	Received fifty-two (52) votes for school director for the full term.
John Kuykendall	Received thirteen (13) votes for school director for the full term.
W. D. Rollings	Received fifty (50) votes for school director for the full term.
William Mott	Received eleven (11) votes for school director for the full term.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true tally list and correct statement of votes cast at the said election, and that S. P. Page was duly elected school director for the full term, and that W. D. Rollings was duly elected school director to fill vacancy.

Dated this 20th day of April, 1895.

Attest: T. E. Velkers, Clerk of the Election.

W. T. Matthis, Samuel Page } Judges of the Election.

The petitioners alleged in their petition that of the sixty-three ballots cast at said election, only the eight cast for said John Kuykendall, and the seven cast for said Samuel Page, and the eight cast for said William M. Mott, in any way or manner designated which candidate the elector desired to serve for the long or three years' term, and which the short or one year term, and alleged that Page and Rollings had been declared elected in violation of law. Defendants answered, denying the material allegations of the petition. A recount of the ballots was had before the court, and it was determined by the court that, of all the legal votes cast, John Kuykendall received nine votes for director for the long term, and William Mott nine votes for director for the short term, and they were declared elected accordingly, and entitled to said offices. From that judgment, defendant Page prosecutes this appeal. The nine ballots counted by the court below as the only legal ballots cast were as follows:

For School Director,
John Kuykendall, long term.
W. M. Mott, short term.

All other ballots were found by the court to be defective, and were counted for no one. There were ten ballots among those rejected by the court, which were as follows:

S. Page, long term.
W. D. Rollings.

Two were as follows:

For School Director,
Sam Page,
Will Rollings.

Seven were as follows:

For Director,
W. D. Rollings.

Thirty-one were as follows:

S. Page,
W. D. Rollings.

Two were as follows:

S. Page.
John Kuykendall.

And two were as follows.

John Kuykendall,
W. M. Mott.

Messrs. Graham & Tibbs, for appellant:

Where an election was held in a school district for school director, and there were no other candidates to be voted for at said election except school director, ballots cast for candidates at said election are not void for uncertainty for the reason that they do not say for school director.

When an election is held in a school district for the election of two school directors only, and four candidates are running, and where there are two to be elected, one for the long or three-year term and one for the short or one-year term, and the ballots read "Sam Page for long term," they should be counted for Sam Page for school director for long term.

People, Aiken, v. Mateson, 17 Ill. 167.

Messrs. Golden & Hamill, for appellee:

In an election contest a ruling excluding a ballot on account of the insufficiency of the marking will not be reviewed unless the record contains the original ballot or a fac simile copy thereof, a verbal description of the same being insufficient.

Lay v. Parsons, 104 Cal. 661.

Where a person places more names on his ticket than there are officers to be elected, the ballot cannot be counted for any of them for that office.

6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 345, and authorities cited notes 1, 2; Chamberlin v. Hartley, 152 Pa. 544.

A ticket cast at a town election had, under the name of the office "For assessor," the printed name of one of the candidates, and under his name was written the name of another candidate, but there was no erasure of either name. It was held that the ballot could not be counted for either candidate.

Blankinship v. Israel, 132 Ill. 514.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Of the sixty-three ballots contained in the record as having been cast at the election in question for school directors, all were rejected by the trial court in the contest proceeding but nine, and, these nine being for the contestants, the contestants were declared elected. The appeal is prosecuted by Page alone. We are therefore only to consider whether Page or Kuykendall received the greater number of votes cast for the office in question at said election; the thirty-one ballots containing nothing but the two names, thus:

S. Page.

—And two other, similar in form, were clearly insufficient to express the intention of the voter. Appellant contends that, as the only office to be filled at this election was school director, it was not necessary that the office should be designated on the ballot, to make the intention of the voter clear. It is plain, however, that if this contention were conceded, notwithstanding the statute requires such designation, it is still wholly uncertain which of the two persons whose names are on the ballot the elector intended to vote for, for the long term, and which for the short term. This choice could be determined only by the voter himself, as expressed by his ballot; and, when the ballot wholly fails to express the choice, it is void and cannot be counted. Chamberlin v. Hartley, 152 Pa. 544; Re Contested Election, 96 Pa. 224.

There were eleven of the rejected ballots which contained the title of the office above the names, but were equally as uncertain as those above mentioned, and in the same respect. We are of the opinion that the county court did not err in refusing to count these ballots. There were, however, ten other ballots rejected by the court concerning which a more serious question arises.

Sections 52 and 53 of the statute in regard to elections are as follows:

"Sec. 52. The manner of voting shall be by ballot. The ballots shall be printed or written, or partly printed and partly written, upon plain paper, with the name of each candidate voted for, and the title of the offices. When the ballot is printed, the same shall be printed upon plain paper, in plain type, in straight lines, with a blank space below each name, of a width not less than equal to the width of the line in which the name is printed.

"Sec. 53. The names of all candidates for which the elector intends to vote shall be written or printed upon the same ballot, and the office to which he desires each to be elected shall be designated upon the ballot."

1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) p. 1008.

Counsel for appellee insists that these ten ballots also are fatally defective, because the title to the office is not designated on them, and because, as they contain two names, it is impossible to ascertain the intention of the voter as to whether he intended to vote for both for the long term or not, or what his intention really was. It is plain that, where there are more offices than one to be voted for, ballots making no designation of the office will be insufficient for uncertainty; and, where there are two officers to be elected for different terms, ballots which do not designate the terms should be rejected. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 345. It is, however, the general rule that the voter shall not be disfranchised or deprived of his right to vote through mere inadvertence, mistake, or ignorance, if an honest intention can be ascertained from his ballot. Parker v. Orr, 158 Ill. 609, 30 L. R. A. 227. And the circumstances surrounding the election may be considered in ascertaining the voter's intention, or to explain imperfection in the ballots. Behrensmeyer v Kreitz, 135 Ill. 59; McKinnon v. People, Malyacher, 110 Ill. 305. This election was only for school directors. It was ordered for that purpose alone. This is fully shown by the pleadings and the evidence, and it cannot be said, we think, that there is any uncertainty as to these ten ballots having been cast for school directors, or, at least, for a school director. Besides, it is apparent from the ballots themselves that there was an attempt on the part of the voter to comply with the statute, and to designate the office; for, after the name of S. Page, and on the same line, are written the words "long term." The only officers to be elected were two school directors, —one for the long or full term of three years, and one for the short term to fill a vacancy. Had there been no other name on these ten ballots than that of Page, we think no doubt could arise that it was the intention of the voters casting these ballots to vote for Page for the office of school director for the full term. We think, also, that there being no candidates to be voted for at this election for any office other than that of school director, the attempted and partial designation of the office on these ballots as to Page was, under the circumstances, a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring the title of the office to be written or printed on the ballot, and that the office to which the voter desires each candidate voted for to be elected shall be designated on the ballot. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 344, and note 1.

It is claimed, however, that as these ten ballots also contain the name of W. D. Rollings without any designation of the office to which the voter desired him to be elected, other than that which followed the name of Page, the ballots should not, under the statute, be counted for either candidate. Section 58 of the statute provides: "If more persons are designated for any office than there are candidates to be elected, . . . such part of the ticket shall not be counted for either of the candidates." In the case of Blankinship v. Israel, 132 Ill. 514, there was but one office and one term to be filled, and two names were preceded by the words "For assessor," and this court held that the ballot should not, under the statute, be counted for either candidate. But can it be said here the ten ballots in dispute have more names designated for any office than there are candidates to be elected? The office here is that of school director. Two candidates were to be elected,—one for the long and one for the short term. It is clear these electors intended to vote for Page for the long term, and it may be and probably was intended that the one year term should apply to Rollings, but the ballots fail to make the designation. As Rollings' case is not before us, it is unnecessary to construe these ballots as to him any further than the effect they may have upon the rights of Page. It cannot be said, in view of the form of these ballots and of the fact that two officers were to be elected, that the words "long term" had the same relation to the name of Rollings as to the name of Page, as did the title "For assessor" in Blankinship v. Israel, supra, in respect to the two names in question in that case. In the case at bar there was simply a failure to designate any office to which these electors desired Rollings to be elected, unless, by the designation of Page for the long term, it might be implied that the voter intended to vote for Rollings for the short term, —the only remaining place to be filled; and the latter view should be adopted, rather than the one that he intended to vote for both for the long term,—if it were necessary in the decision of the case to adopt either view. A construction will not be adopted which would deprive the elector of his vote when his ballot is equally susceptible of another construction which will give it effect. Our conclusion is that these ten ballots should have been counted for Page, and that the county court erred in rejecting them and in declaring that Kuykendall, and not Page, was entitled to the office.

Questions upon the pleadings and the procedure in the case have been discussed by counsel, but, as they would not affect the result, we have not thought it necessary to consider them. The court seems to have regarded the proceeding in some respects as a suit at law, and entered a judgment accordingly. It is sufficient to say that the practice in such cases is, to all intents and purposes, the same as in chancery, and not as in a suit at law. Dale v. Irwin, 78 Ill. 170; Talkington v. Turner, 71 Ill. 234; Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer, 125 Ill. 141. The judgment of the county court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition as against Page, at the cost of appellee, Kuykendall.

Messrs. S. P. Shope, Thomas H. Gault, and Otto C. Eigholz, for defendant in error:

The plaintiff in error was not himself a barber but the proprietor of a great hotel, and insisted upon keeping open these shops and in effect compelling the workmen therein to perform the ordinary business upon the Sabbath.

It is idle to talk of the freedom of the employee to work for whom he pleases and to rest at his will.

That Sunday is a day of rest and quietude of cessation from labor and to be observed as such by the public at large is as firmly engrafted upon the policy of our body politic as if it had been directly commanded by the organic law.

All experience has shown that incessant toil lessens the capacity for mental or physical labor, brings early decay and decrepitude, and retards and obstructs the growth and development of the immature. Sunday laws therefore, like all true laws, are founded upon the necessity of our common nature, the conditions of our well being, progress, and happiness.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 184.

To make Sunday a day of rest it is not sufficient to interdict labor only. The means of enjoyment of the day, making it really a day of rest, are indispensable. To deny these means is to destroy the rational end and purpose of its institution.

There is nothing in Sunday laws that interferes with a natural, indefeasible, or constitutional right of all men to worship according to the dictates of their own conscience. Their command simply is that there shall be a cessation from labor upon the day.

The legislature may deem it advisable to prescribe peculiar rules for the several occupations and to establish distinctions in the rights, obligations, duties, and capacities of citizens. If the laws be otherwise unobjectionable all that can be required in this case is that they be general in their application to the class or locality to which they apply, and they are then public in character, and of their propriety and policy the legislature must be the judge.

Craig, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was convicted in the criminal court of Cook county for the violation of an act to prohibit barber shops from being kept open on Sunday, and for a violation of the law he was fined $25. The act was passed at the last session of the legislature, and contained two sections as follows:

"(Sec. 1). Be it enacted by the people of the state of Illinois, represented in the general assembly, that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to keep open any barber shop or carry on the business of shaving, haircutting, or tonsorial work on Sunday, within this state.

"(Sec. 2). Any person by himself, agent, or employee violating the provisions of § 1 of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not exceeding two hundred ($200) dollars for each and every offense."

It is contended in the argument that by the act in question that part of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution (§ 1) has been violated which reads as follows: "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is also contended that the act violates § 2 of art. 2 of the Illinois Constitution of 1870, viz.: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law;" and also art. 4, § 22, the general clause of which reads: "In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted." It is conceded in the argument that if the legislature had enacted a law prohibiting all business on Sunday, its validity could not be questioned; that such a law would violate none of the constitutional provisions relied upon. The common law of England, as adopted in this state as part of our jurisprudence, does not prohibit the citizen from pursuing his ordinary labor on Sunday. Nor is a contract entered into between two parties in this state void because executed on Sunday. Rex v. Brotherton, 1 Strange, 702; Drury v. Defontaine, 1 Taunt. 131; Sayles v. Smith, 12 Wend. 57, 27 Am. Dec. 117; Richmond v. Moore, 107 Ill. 431, 47 Am. Rep. 445. On the other hand, at common law Sunday has always been regarded dies non juridicus,—a day upon which courts could not transact other than necessary or ministerial business. In England, however, the law which permitted the transaction of business and the pursuit of one's ordinary labor was changed by statute (29 Car. II.) which provides that "no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer or other person whatsoever shall do or exercise any worldly business or work on the Lord's day," works of necessity and charity being excepted. This statute has substantially been adopted by the legislatures of many of the states in the Union. This state has not, however, followed the other states in the adoption of the English statute, but we have legislated on this subject for ourselves in a manner thought to be for the best interests of our people. That legislation will be found in paragraph 261 of our Criminal Code, as follows: "Whoever disturbs the peace and good order of society by labor (works of necessity and charity excepted), or by any amusement or diversion on Sunday, shall be fined not exceeding $25. This section shall not be construed to prevent watermen and railroad companies from landing their passengers, or watermen from loading and unloading their cargoes, or ferrymen from carrying over the water travelers and persons moving their families on the first day of the week, nor to prevent the due exercise of the rights of conscience by whomever thinks proper to keep any other day as a Sabbath." The preceding paragraph (260) provides: "Sunday shall include the time from midnight to midnight." There is a wide and well-marked distinction between the English statute and ours. The English statute prohibits labor and business on Sunday, while our statute merely prohibits labor and amusement which disturbs the peace and good order of society. In Richmond v. Moore, supra, in speaking of the difference between the two statutes, it is said (p. 433): "A mere glance at that and our statute will show that they are materially different. That prohibits labor and business; ours only prohibits labor or amusement that disturbs the peace and good order of society. The offense by that statute is the performance of labor or business, and by ours it is the disturbance of the peace and good order of society. The British statute is much more comprehensive in its purposes and language than ours. Ours only prohibits labor that disturbs the peace and good order of society, not naming business, whilst the British statute renders the mere act of labor or business penal."

Under the law of this state as it existed prior to the passage of the act in question, each and every citizen of the state was left perfectly free to labor and transact business on Sunday, or refrain from labor and business, as he might choose, so long as he did not disturb the peace and good order of society. By the act in question an attempt has been made by the legislature to inaugurate a radical change in the law as to a class of the laboring element of the state,—the barbers. This statute, as has been seen, declares "that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to keep open any barber shop or carry on the business of shaving, haircutting, or tonsorial work on Sunday." That act is plain, and its meaning is obvious. The owner of a place where is carried on the barber business is prohibited from doing any business whatever during one day in the week. He may have in his employ a dozen men, and yet during one day in seven he is deprived of their labor, and also deprived of his own labor. The income derived from his place and his own labor and the labor of his employees are his property, but the legislature has by the act taken that property from him. The journeyman barber who works by the day or the week or for a share of the amount he may receive from customers for his services is by the law denied the right of laboring one day in the week. He may rely solely upon his labor for the support of himself and family, his labor may be the only property that he possesses, and yet this law takes that property away from him. His labor is his capital, and that capital is all the property he owns. Can a law which takes that from the laborer be sustained? The Constitution of the United States says the state shall not deprive any person of property without due process of law, and our state Constitution declares the same thing. What is understood by the term "due process of law" is not an open question. "Due process of law" is synonymous with "law of the land," and the "law of the land" is general public law, binding upon all the members of the community, under all circumstances; and not partial or private laws, affecting the rights of private individuals or classes of individuals." Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869. Is the act in question a law binding upon all the members of the community? A glance at its provisions affords a negative answer. The act affects one class of laborers, and one class alone. The merchant and his clerks, the restaurant keeper with his employees, the clothing-house proprietor, the blacksmith, the livery stable keeper, the owners of street-car lines, and people engaged in every other branch of business, are each and all allowed to open their respective places of business on Sunday, and transact their ordinary business if they desire, but the barber, and he alone, is required to close his place of business. The barber is thus deprived of property without due process of law, in direct violation of the Constitutions of the United States and of this state. In Millett v. People, supra, the validity of an act of the legislature requiring owners and operators of coal mines to weigh coal in a certain specified manner arose, and it was held not competent for the legislature to single out owners and operators of coal mines, and provide that they should bear burdens not imposed on other owners of property or employers of labor, and prohibit them from making contracts which it is competent for other owners of property or employers of labor to make, and that such legislation cannot be sustained as an exercise of the police power. In Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492, where the validity of an act of the legislature arose which prohibited persons engaged in mining or manufacturing from keeping stores for furnishing supplies, tools, clothing, provisions, or groceries to their employees while so engaged in mining and manufacturing, the law was held to be in conflict with the Constitution. In the decision of the case it is, among other things, said (p. 180): "The privilege or liberty to engage in or control the business of keeping and selling clothing, provisions of presumptive value, groceries, etc., to employees is one of profit,—and thus, by the effect of these sections, what the employers in other industries may do for their pecuniary gain, with impunity, and have the law to protect and enforce, the miner and manufacturer, under precisely the same circumstances and conditions are prohibited from doing for their pecuniary gain. The same act, in substance and in principle, if done by the one, is lawful; but if done by the other is not only unlawful, but a misdemeanor. . . . The privilege of contracting is both a liberty and a property right, and if A is denied the right to contract and acquire property in a manner which he has hitherto enjoyed under the law, and which B, C, and D are allowed by the law to enjoy, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract. In Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 853, the case last cited was quoted with approval, and it was held that the act of 1881, which requires the owners and operators of coal mines, when the miner is paid on the basis of the amount of coal mined and delivered by him, to weigh the coal on pit cars before it is screened, and to pay on such weights, is in violation of § 2, art. 2, of the state Constitution, as depriving a class of persons of the liberty and property right of making contracts without due process of law. In Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, the question of the validity of an act of the legislature arose which required certain specified corporations to pay their employees their wages weekly. It was held that, as the act was applicable only to certain corporations, and did not operate on all corporations for pecuniary profit, and individuals, it was unconstitutional, as depriving the corporations affected thereby of the right of liberty and property without due process of law. In speaking of the term "liberty" as used in the Constitution, it is there said (p. 70): "There can be no liberty, protected by government, that is not regulated by such laws as will preserve the right of each citizen to pursue his own advancement and happiness in his own way, subject, only, to the restraints necessary to secure the same right to all others. The fundamental principle upon which liberty is based . . . is equality under the law of the land. It has accordingly been everywhere held that liberty, as that term is used in the Constitution, means not only freedom of the citizen from servitude and restraint, but is deemed to embrace the right of every man to be free in the use of his powers and faculties, and to adopt and pursue such avocation or calling as he may choose, subject only to the restraints necessary to secure the common welfare." In Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 101, 29 L. R. A. 79, the question arose in regard to the validity of a statute which provided that no female shall be employed in any factory or workshop more than eight hours in any one day or forty-eight hours in any one week, and it was held that the right to labor or employ labor and make contracts in respect thereto, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, is both a liberty and a property right, and is included in the guaranty of § 2, art. 2, of the Constitution; and that the act prohibiting the employment of females in any factory or workshop for more than eight hours a day is unconstitutional, as being partial and discriminating in its character. In the decision of the case it is said (p. 104): "Labor is property, and the laborer has the same right to sell his labor and to contract with reference thereto, as has any other property owner. In this country the legislature has no power to prevent persons who are sui juris from making their own contracts, nor can it interfere with the freedom of contract between the workman and the employer." If the legislature has no power to prohibit by law a woman from being employed in a factory or workshop more than eight hours in any one day or forty-eight hours in a week, upon what principle, it may be asked, has the legislature the right to prohibit a barber from laboring and receiving the fruits of his labor during any number of hours he may desire to work during the week? If a woman may be allowed to determine the number of hours she may work in a week, why not allow a barber the same right? Moreover, if the merchant, the grocer, the butcher, the druggist, and those engaged in other trades and callings are allowed to open their places of business and carry on their respective avocations during seven days of the week, upon what principle can it be held that a person who may be engaged in the business of barbering may not do the same thing? Why should a discrimination be made against that calling and that alone? But it is said the law may be sustained under the police power of the state. In Tiedeman on Police Powers, the author (§ 85) says: "The state in the exercise of its police power, is, as a general proposition, authorized to subject all occupations to a reasonable regulation, where such regulation is required for the protection of public interests, or the public welfare. It is also conceded that there is a limit to the exercise of this power, and that it is not an unlimited arbitrary power, which would enable the legislature to prohibit a business the prosecution of which inflicts no damage upon others." The author also lays down the rule that it is within the discretion of the legislature to institute such regulations when a proper case arises; but it is a judicial question whether the trade or calling is of such a nature as to justify police regulation. In Millett v. People, supra, in speaking of the police power of the state as applicable to the case then before the court, it is said (p. 303): "Their requirements have no tendency to insure the personal safety of the miner, or to protect his property, or the property of others. They do not meet Dwarris' definition of 'police regulations.' They do not have reference to the comfort, the safety, or the welfare of society. (Potter's Dwarr. Stat. 458.) In Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 121, it was said: 'The law will not allow the rights of property to be invaded under the guise of a police regulation for the promotion of health, when it is manifest that such is not the object and purpose of the regulation.' See also . . . Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315, 12 Am. Rep. 694, and cases referred to in Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 109, 50 Am. Rep. 636." In Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 484, in speaking in reference to a regulation made for one class of citizens, it is said: "Distinctions in these respects must rest upon some reason upon which they can be defended,—like the want of capacity in infants and insane persons; and if the legislature should undertake to provide that persons following some specified lawful trade or employment should not have capacity to make contracts, or to receive conveyances, . . . or in any other way to make such use of their property as was permissible to others, it can scarcely be doubted that the act would transcend the due bounds of legislative power, even though no express constitutional provision could be pointed out with which it would come in conflict." It will not and cannot be claimed that the law in question was passed as a sanitary measure, or that it has any relation whatever to the health of society. As has been heretofore seen, as a general rule a police regulation has reference to the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society. How, it may be asked, is the health, the comfort, safety, or welfare of society to be injuriously affected by keeping open a barber shop on Sunday? It is a matter of common observation that the barber business, as carried on in this state, is both quiet and orderly. Indeed, it is shown by the evidence incorporated in the record that the barber business, as conducted, is quiet and orderly,—much more so than may other departments of business. In view of the nature of the business and the manner in which it is carried on, it is difficult to perceive how the rights of any person can be affected, or how the comfort or welfare of society can be disturbed. If the act were one calculated to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society, then it might be regarded as an exercise of the police power of the state. In Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611, it was held that if the law prohibits that which is harmless in itself, or requires that to be done which does not tend to promote the health, comfort, safety, or welfare of society, it will, in such case, be an unauthorized exercise of power, and it would be the duty of courts to declare such legislation void. In Ritchie v. People, supra, in speaking of the police power of the state, the court said (p. 110): "The police power of the state is that power which enables it to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society. It is very broad and far-reaching, but is not without its limitations. Legislative acts passed in pursuance of it must not be in conflict with the Constitution, and must have some relation to the ends sought to be accomplished; that is to say, to the comfort, welfare, or safety of society. Where the ostensible object of an enactment is to secure the public comfort, welfare, or safety, it must appear to be adapted to that end; it cannot invade the rights of person and property under the guise of a mere police regulation, when it is not such in fact; and where such an act takes away the property of a citizen, or interferes with his personal liberty, it is the province of the courts to determine whether it is really an appropriate measure for the promotion of the comfort, safety, and welfare of society." We do not, therefore, think the law was authorized by the police power of the state. If the public welfare of the state demands that all business and all labor of every description except works of necessity and charity should cease on Sunday, the first day of the week, and that day shall be kept as a day of rest, the legislature has the power to enact a law requiring all persons to refrain from their ordinary callings on that day (Cooley, Const Lim. p. 725). All will be then placed on a perfect equality, and no one can complain of an unjust discrimination. But when the legislature undertakes to single out one class of labor, harmless in itself, and condemn that, and that alone, it transcends its legitimate powers, and its action cannot be sustained.

Judgment will be reversed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

(.....Cal.....)

1. A statute prohibiting barbers to carry on business after twelve o'clock on Sunday or on a legal holiday, and applying to no other class of labor, is unconstitutional as special, unjust, and unreasonable, working an invasion of individual liberty, since it is based upon no distinction to justify singling out that class of laborers.

2. A law is not general because it operates upon all within a class unless there is a substantial reason why it is made to operate upon that class only and not generally upon all.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure petitioner's discharge from custody to which he had been committed for violating a statute prohibiting barbers from keeping their shops open during certain hours on Sunday. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Darwin C. Allen, for petitioner:

The Declaration of Rights contained in our Constitution enumerates many of the most cherished ones preserved by our British ancestors in their conflicts with the claims of prerogative.

Among the retained rights is the right of freedom from servitude, imprisonment, and restraint without reason, the right to use one's faculties in all innocent and lawful ways, to live and work where he will, to enjoy the society of his family, to support his household, to nourish and educate his offspring, and to earn his livelihood in any lawful calling.

The courts should declare void any legislative enactment which, under the alleged exercise of police power, impairs or denies these and kindred rights, that bear no relation whatever to a just exercise of that power, and to the control of which no authority, except tyranny, has ever attained.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 481–486; Burlamaqui, chap. 3, § 15; Federalist No. 84; Kent, Com. pt. 4.

Legislation will be considered special which applies to a selected or designated class, even though it embraces the whole of the class, unless there appears some reason why its operation should or may be restricted to the selected class.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Petitioner was convicted under section 310½ of the Penal Code, which is a new section, enacted in 1895, and which provides as follows: "Every person who as proprietor, manager, lessee, employee, or agent keeps open or conducts, or causes to be kept open or conducted, any barber shop, bath house and barber shop, barber shop of a bathing establishment, or hair-dressing establishment, or any place for shaving or hair-dressing used and conducted in connection with any other place of business or resort, or who engages at work or labor as a barber in any such shop or establishment on Sunday, or on a legal holiday, after the hour of twelve o'clock M. of said day, is guilty of a misdemeanor." It is contended that the section is in violation of the following constitutional provisions:

Article 1, § 1: "All men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; and pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness."

Article 1, § 21: "No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the legislature; nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens."

Article 4, § 25, subsecs, 2, 33: "The legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: Second. For the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors." "In all cases where a general law can be made applicable."

In construing so-called "Sunday Laws," courts have variously regarded them, some from a religious view, others from a secular, and still others from an anomalous commingling of both. In this state they have never been upheld from a religious standpoint. Under a Constitution which guarantees to all equal liberty of religion and conscience, any law which forbids an act not in itself contra bonos mores, because that act is repugnant to the beliefs of one religious sect, of necessity interferes with the liberty of those who hold to other beliefs or to none at all. Liberty of conscience and belief is preserved alike to the followers of Christ, to Buddhist, and Mohammedan, to all who think that their tenets alone are illumined by the light of divine truth; but it is equally preserved to the skeptic, agnostic, atheist, and infidel, who says in his heart, "There is no God." So it has come to be the established rule in this state to view and construe such laws as civil and secular enactments. Ex parte Andrews, 18 Cal. 678; Ex parte Koser, 60 Cal. 177. Thus construed, these laws, when decreed valid, are upheld as a proper exercise of the police power, as an exercise of the legislative prerogative to regulate the relations, contracts, intercourse, and business of society at large, and its particular members with respect to each other. Herein it is held that the legislature may pass laws for the preservation of health and the promotion of good morals,—propositions which are indisputable.

Says Mr. Justice Field in Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 521: "Labor is a necessity imposed by the condition of our race, and to protect labor is the highest office of our laws." It is this language which respondent quotes and relies upon in support of the validity of this penal statute. Upon the question thus presented of the proper limits of the police power much might be written, and much, indeed, will have to be written, ere just bounds are set to its exercise. But in this case neither time permits nor necessity demands the consideration. Still it may be suggested in passing that our government was not designed to be paternal in form. We are a self-governing people, and our just pride is that our laws are made by us as well as for us. Every individual citizen is to be allowed so much liberty as may exist without impairment of the equal rights of his fellows. Our institutions are founded upon the conviction that we are not only capable of self-government as a community, but, what is the logical necessity, that we are capable, to a great extent, of individual self-government. If this conviction shall prove ill founded, we have built our house upon sand. The spirit of a system such as ours is therefore at total variance with that which, more or less veiled, still shows in the paternalism of other nations. It may be injurious to health to eat bread before it is twenty-four hours old, yet it would strike us with surprise to see the legislature making a crime of the sale of fresh bread. We look with disfavor upon such legislation as we do upon the enactment of sumptuary laws. We do not even punish a man for his vices, unless they be practiced openly, so as to lead to the spread of corruption, or to breaches of the peace, or to public scandal. In brief, we give to the individual the utmost possible amount of personal liberty, and, with that guaranteed him, he is treated as a person of responsible judgment, not as a child in his nonage, and is left free to work out his destiny as impulse, education, training, heredity, and environment direct him. So, while the police power is one whose proper use makes most potently for good, in its undefined scope and inordinate exercise lurks no small danger to the republic; for the difficulty which is experienced in defining its just limits and bounds affords a temptation to the legislature to encroach upon the rights of citizens with experimental laws none the less dangerous because well meant. We think the act under consideration gives plain evidence of such encroachment. It is sought to be upheld by the argument that it is a police regulation; that it seeks to protect labor against the oppression of capital. The people have passed the law; let not the courts interfere with it. If the people are dissatisfied, they may amend or repeal it.

It is not easy to see where or how this law protects labor from the unjust exactions of capital. A man's constitutional liberty means more than his personal freedom. It means, with many other rights, his right freely to labor, and to own the fruits of his toil. It is a curious law for the protection of labor which punishes the laborer for working. Yet that is precisely what this law does. The laboring barber engaged in a most respectable, useful, and cleanly pursuit, is singled out from the thousands of his fellows in other employments, and told that, willy nilly, he shall not work upon holidays and Sundays after 12 o'clock noon. His wishes, tastes, or necessities are not consulted. If he labors, he is a criminal. Such protection to labor, carried a little further, would send him from the jail to the poorhouse. How comes it that the legislative eye was so keen to discern the needs of the oppressed barber, and yet was blind to his toiling brethren in other vocations? Steam car and street car operatives toil through long and weary Sunday hours; so do mill and factory hands. There is no Sunday period of rest, and no protection for the overworked employees of our daily papers. Do these not need rest and protection? The bare suggestion of these considerations shows the injustice and inequality of this law. In brief, whether or not a general law to promote rest from labor in all business vocations may be upheld as within the due exercise of the police power as imposing for its welfare a needed period of repose upon the whole community, a law such as this certainly cannot. A law is not always general because it operates upon all within a class. There must be back of that a substantial reason why it is made to operate only upon a class, and not generally upon all. As was said in Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238: "The conclusion is that, although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." And in Darcy v. San José, 104 Cal. 642: "This classification, however, must be founded upon differences which are either defined by the Constitution or natural, and which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity in the legislation." In the case of our cities the Constitution itself decrees a classification by population, and the differing exigencies of municipal government require that laws operating upon any class should be held general; otherwise the constitutional scheme itself is overthrown. But in a law such as this no reason has been or can be shown why the followers of one useful and unobjectionable employment should be debarred from the right to labor upon certain days, and others in like classes of employment be not so debarred. If it be constitutional to single one such class, and debar its members from the right to labor on one day in the week, it would be constitutional to prohibit them from following their vocation upon six days of the week. When any one such class is singled out and put under the criminal ban of a law such as this, the law not only is special, unjust, and unreasonable in its operation, but it works an invasion of individual liberty,—the liberty of free labor, which it pretends to protect. Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550, 36 Am. Rep. 47, in no wise conflicts with these views. There was an additional vice in that law. While the classification was in itself arbitrary, as in this case, the law did not include all who came within the arbitrary classification thus made. It was this ground only which was discussed, and upon which the law was overthrown. Here, however, the designated class is based upon no distinction, and, as is said by Judge Cooley: "Everyone has a right to demand that he be governed by general rules; and a special statute that singles his case out as one to be regulated by a different law from that which is applied in all similar cases would not be legitimate legislation, but an arbitrary mandate, unrecognized by the law."

MUSCUPIABE LAND & WATER COMPANY, Resp't.

(.....Cal.....)

1. In the absence of the evidence it will be assumed that findings of fact by the court below were sustained by the evidence and contain all the facts which the evidence established.

2. The apportionment of the flow of a stream by periods of time rather than by a division of its quantity so that upper and lower proprietors may each have the full flow for designated periods instead of a portion of the flow all the time, which equity may order when the absorption and evaporation of the water would prevent any from reaching the lower proprietor if the flow was divided, may be valid as to water used for domestic purposes as well as that used for irrigation.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Bernardino County in favor of defendant in an action to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiff's water supply. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harris & Gregg and Byron Waters for appellant.

Messrs. W. P. Gardiner, E. E. Rowell, and Willis, Cole, & Craig, for appellee.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the owner of a rectangular tract of land, having an area of 1,000 acres, lying to the south and west of a larger tract belonging to the defendant, the Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, and through both of these tracts of land there flows a stream of water known by the name of "Devil Canyon Creek." This stream has its source in the mountains north of the defendant's tract, and flows through the canyon in a southerly direction, and thence southerly and southeasterly, through the defendant's tract of land, to the north line of the plaintiff's tract, which it crosses in a southeasterly direction, and again enters the defendant's tract. The length of its course through the defendant's land before it reaches the plaintiff's land is 15,570 feet, and its course southeasterly across the plaintiff's land is 3,200 feet in length, when it again enters the land of the defendant, through which it flows for 13,450 feet. Of the lands of the plaintiff, only the northerly 245 acres are within the watershed of this stream, and riparian thereto. With irrigation this land can be made productive, but without irrigation it is dry and practically useless. The land of the defendant, which lies to the north of the plaintiff's land, adjacent to and bordering upon the stream, is rough, rocky, sandy, and worthless, and for the first 4,000 feet south of the place where the stream enters this land is not susceptible of cultivation. Below this point, and at a short distance to the eastward of the stream, a portion of the defendant's land—about 1,200 acres in extent, lying north of a prolongation of the north line of the plaintiff's tract—is within the watershed of the stream, and if irrigated from the stream, may be made productive. In July, 1891, the defendant diverted upon this land all the waters of the stream above the plaintiff's tract, and thereupon the plaintiff commenced the present action for the damages sustained thereby and to enjoin the defendant from any further interference with the flow of the stream. The cause was tried by the court, which found, in addition to the foregoing facts, the following: "(22) The most valuable use to which the water of said stream can be put is that of irrigation. The portion thereof that would be required for domestic and culinary purposes and for watering stock would not perceptibly diminish the volume of water flowing in the stream, when there is sufficient therein to be available for irrigation. (23) The bed of said stream is sandy and porous, and the air in that locality is, during the irrigating season, dry and hot. The quantity of water usually flowing in the stream varies greatly in different years, and in different seasons of the same year, and considerably in different portions of the day, there being more flowing at night than in the daytime. The usual irrigating season lasts from June 1 to October 1. During the winter season, and when the water is not wanted for irrigation, there is more water flowing therein than is needed, or can be used, by the riparian owners. After the water enters the lands of the Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, a large portion thereof is lost by evaporation and by absorption, before it reaches the 1,000 acre tract of said Wiggins. The flow of the stream also greatly diminishes from the end of the rainy season until about August 15 of each year. (24) In a season of average rainfall, when there is no diversion of the water of said stream, the usual flow of the water therein at the point where it enters the land of said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, and at the point where it enters the land of Wiggins, computed in miners' inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, is as follows: 'From July 1 to July 15: At the north line of said company's land, 150 inches; at the north line of Wiggins' place, 50 inches. From July 15 to September 10: At the north line of said company's land, 100 inches; at the north line of Wiggins' place, none. From September 10 to October 1: At the north line of said company's land, 150 inches; at the north line of Wiggins' place, 50 inches. When there is no more than 100 inches at the point where said stream enters the land of said company, the same is all taken up by evaporation and absorption, so that none of it reaches the 1,000-acre tract of said Wiggins.' (25) The said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company has constructed and now maintains a dam across the said stream, and a ditch leading therefrom onto the land of the company aforesaid sufficient in size to carry all the waters of said stream. When, during the irrigating season, the water of said stream is all diverted in said ditch until the bed thereof below the said dam becomes dry, and the water is afterwards turned again down and allowed to flow in said stream uninterrupted, it requires two days' flow before any of it will reach the 1,000-acre tract of Wiggins, owing to the absorption of water by the creek bed, and the evaporation by the heat and dryness of the air, and the said stream does not attain its full flow at the north line of Wiggins' tract until about five days after it is so returned to said stream. (26) If the said stream were divided by quantity at the dam of said company, and the proper proportion in quantity which would be due to each of said riparian owners for his reasonable use thereof was allowed to flow in separate streams to each, the amount allowed to said Wiggins would be so small that none of it would ever reach his land. (27) The amount of water required to irrigate such of the lands of the said company and of said Wiggins as is properly susceptible of irrigation is the equivalent of a constant flow of 1 miner's inch, measured under a 4-inch pressure, to each 5 acres of said land. (28) Under all the circumstances and facts in this case, a reasonable and equitable division of said water between the said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company and the said Wiggins would be to allow to the said Wiggins the full flow of the stream, uninterrupted and continuous, for eight days out of each forty days, beginning April 1 of each year, upon said 1,000 acre tract, and to allow to the said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company the full flow of the stream during the remaining portion of each period of forty days: provided that when there are no more than 100 miners' inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, flowing in said stream at the point where it enters the land of the said Muscupiabe Land & Water Company, the said company should be allowed to divert all the water of said stream, and to continue so to divert the same until there are more than 100 inches aforesaid flowing at said point." The conclusions of law, and the judgment thereon, follow substantially the 28th finding, and by the judgment the plaintiff is enjoined from diverting the water of the stream for use upon any portion of his 1,000-acre tract, except the northerly 245 acres thereof, and the defendant is enjoined from diverting the waters of the stream for use anywhere, except upon its land lying to the north of a line drawn in prolongation of the north boundary of the plaintiff's tract. From the judgment thus rendered the plaintiff has appealed, bringing the appeal here upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions, and urges in support of his appeal that the findings of fact are insufficient to sustain or justify the judgment.

One of the grounds for a reversal urged by the appellant is that the judgment fails to provide for his right to use the waters of the stream for culinary or domestic purposes. The claim that this right is denied by the judgment is not sustained by the record. The judgment makes no limitation upon the use to which the water shall be applied by either of the parties, except that it shall not be used upon land which is not riparian to the stream. The principle contended for by the appellant is that the court had no authority to render a judgment by which he would be prevented from a continual flow of the stream for these purposes, and, although he has cited expressions from some opinions in support of this contention, an examination of the cases in which they occur fails to sustain the principle invoked by him. The opinion of Mr. Justice Thornton in Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 253, was not concurred in by any of the other justices; and in Alta Land & W. Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, it was held that the plaintiff had no interest in the waters of the stream, and consequently the use to which the water might be applied by either party was not before the court for consideration. By the common law a distinction was recognized between the right of a riparian owner to the ordinary use of the water for supplying his natural wants for domestic uses and for cattle, and the right to its use for his artificial wants, such as pleasure grounds, manufacturing, etc.; and although, in the exercise of this right, the superior proprietor might make any reasonable use of the flow of the stream for all domestic purposes, irrespective of any diminution caused thereby to the injury of an inferior proprietor, he could not exercise the right for any extraordinary use that would interfere with the rights of the inferior proprietors, or interrupt the regular flow of the stream, if thereby he interfered with its lawful use by them. Miner v. Gilmour, 12 Moore, P. C. C. 156; Wadsworth v. Tillotson, 15 Conn. 366, 39 Am. Dec. 391.

The power of a court of equity to apportion the flow of water in a stream to the respective riparian owners by periods of time, rather than by a division of its quantity, so that each may have the full flow of the stream during such designated periods, instead of a portion of the flow during all the time, when the circumstances are such that a division in this manner would better conserve the rights of all the riparian owners, was fully considered and established in Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676. It was said in that case: "According to the common-law doctrine of riparian ownership as generally declared in England and in most American states, upon the facts in the case at bar the plaintiffs would be entitled to have the waters of the Harrison canyon continue to flow to and upon their land as they were naturally accustomed to flow, without any substantial deterioration in quality or diminution in quantity. But in some of the western and southwestern states and territories, where the year is divided into one wet and one dry season, and irrigation is necessary to successful cultivation of the soil, the doctrine of riparian ownership has by judicial decision been modified, or rather enlarged, so as to include the reasonable use of natural water for irrigating the riparian land, although such use may appreciably diminish the flow down to the lower riparian proprietor. And this must be taken to be the established rule in California,—at least where irrigation is thus necessary." In an arid country, water for irrigation may become a natural want of man, as exigent as when needed for domestic purposes, since without it vegetation would cease, and the sources of life be indirectly destroyed. Evans v. Merriweather, 4 Ill. 496, 38 Am. Dec. 106. When, as in the present case, a stream, instead of increasing as it goes towards the sea, constantly diminishes, until it finally disappears, or ceases to have any appreciable volume, it is very evident that its beneficial use can be regulated better by periods of time, rather than by a division of its quantity. A perpetual use of the water by all of the proprietors would be impracticable, for the reason that a perpetual use by the upper proprietor would, during a large portion of the year, entirely deprive the lower proprietor of any flow, and a just protection of the rights of both is best effected by its division in periods of time. In Harris v. Harrison the plaintiff claimed in his complaint the right to divert the waters of the stream for domestic uses as well as irrigation, but the power of the court to apportion the water for purposes of irrigation was the point chiefly presented and considered in the opinion of the court. The same principles, however, which authorize an apportionment of the flow by periods of time, for purposes of irrigation, justify such apportionment for domestic uses. The use to which different proprietors may apply the waters of the stream which flows through their lands is not the foundation of their right to the flow of the stream, nor is the owner's right to the flow of the stream governed by the uses to which the water may be applied, but it is a right annexed to the land, and a part thereof, and is an inherent element of the property which he has in the land itself. This right in each proprietor is, however, relative to the rights of the other riparian proprietors, and is to be exercised with proper regard to those rights.

The evidence before the superior court has not been brought before us, and we must assume, not only that the findings of fact made by that court were sustained by the evidence, but also that the findings which were made contain all the facts which the evidence before the court authorized it to make. As the appellant must show that the court below has committed error, it was incumbent upon him, if he would controvert the correctness of its judgment by reason of its failure to make suitable provision for his domestic needs, to show that he offered evidence upon this issue, and that the court failed to give due consideration to this evidence. By invoking the aid of a court of equity to protect him in his rights, he binds himself to recognize and observe the rights which the court may determine are held by others in the same subject-matter; and, if he would question the judgment of the court upon these relative rights, he must show that he presented to the court evidence of the rights which he claims the court has failed to protect. Not only does the record fail to disclose that any evidence was offered by the appellant tending to show that he requires any water for domestic uses, but the finding of the court that his tract of land, without irrigation, is dry and practically useless, tends to destroy his claim for such uses. In the absence of the evidence, we must hold that, in its allotment of the amount of water to be given to each party, the court took into consideration all of the uses for which it was shown that the water was available,—domestic uses as well as irrigation; that it considered the rights of the respective claimants, as well in view of the purposes for which the water was required, as of the amount of water available for such purposes. The finding of the court that the only way to provide for a reasonable use of the water is to divide its flow by periods of time, as well as its finding of the specific periods which, "under all the circumstances and facts in this case," would be a reasonable and equitable division of the water, must be held to be justified by the evidence, and to provide for all the uses to which either proprietor is entitled to apply the water. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the inferior proprietor has a necessity for a continuous flow for domestic purposes, any more than for purposes of irrigation. In either case he is entitled to only a reasonable use, and what is a reasonable use is a question of fact, depending upon all the circumstances appearing in each case. If neither of the proprietors has any use for the water other than for domestic purposes, a court would naturally fix the length of the periods during which each should be entitled to the flow, as well as the frequency of their recurrence, different from what it would if the waters of the stream were used for irrigation; but, whenever it should appear from the circumstances of the case that the only method by which either proprietor could have a reasonable use of the stream would be to allow to each its full flow for a reasonable time, the only equitable adjustment of their rights would be to thus apportion the flow. Whether this apportionment should be for alternate weeks, or alternate days, or for a specific portion of each day, must be determined by the facts of each case, and in the absence of the evidence of these facts the action of the trial court must be held to be correct.

The record does not disclose the amount of water flowing in the stream at any other dates than between the 1st of July and the 1st of October, or that there is at any time a flow of more than 150 inches at the point where it enters the land of the defendant; and, although it may be assumed that the loss by absorption and evaporation is greater during the summer than in the winter, the only finding upon this point is that, when there is no more than 100 inches at the point where the stream enters the land of the defendant, the same is all taken up by evaporation and absorption, so that none of it reaches the 1,000-acre tract of the plaintiff, and that in a season of average rainfall this is the actual loss between July 1 and October 1. The loss by absorption and evaporation is so great that without any consumption by the defendant for any purposes, only 50 inches would reach the land of the plaintiff at any portion of this period. How much of this 50 inches is consumed or required by the defendant for domestic purposes or natural wants is not shown, but it is consistent with the findings of the court to assume that it appeared from the evidence before it that the necessities of the superior proprietor for domestic uses were such that, by giving him the right to a continuous flow, none of the water would reach the land of the plaintiff during the irrigating season. It is very evident from the record that the cause was tried with reference to the rights of the respective parties to the water for purposes of irrigation, and that the right to the water for domestic purposes was not considered an issue in the case, or made a subject of controversy at the trial. Although, in his complaint, the plaintiff alleged, in general terms, his right to the waters of the stream "for the irrigation of said land, and for culinary and domestic purposes," his specific allegations that during the irrigating season "no more water reaches his land than is required for irrigating the cultivated portion thereof," and that he has no other source of irrigating the cultivated portion of his tract than from the waters of the stream, and the further allegation that the damage which would be sustained by him in consequence of a diversion of the waters by the defendant, and for which he sought the aid of the court, was the destruction of the fruit trees and vines and alfalfa growing on the land, justify the conclusion that the right to divert the waters for irrigation was the only issue presented to the court. The finding of the court that the most valuable use to which the waters of the stream can be put is that of irrigation, and its further finding that when there is sufficient water in the stream to be available for irrigation the portion that would be required for domestic and culinary purposes would not perceptibly diminish its value, corroborate this conclusion.

It is further contended by the appellant that, inasmuch as the court finds that he has cultivated 85 acres of his irrigable land, and that the respondent has cultivated only 13 acres of its irrigable land, and, as it does not appear that the respondent intends in the future to irrigate or cultivate any greater area, the judgment should not have given the defendant the use of the greater portion of the water. The right of a riparian owner to the use of the water is not, however, measured by the amount which he actually uses, and it is not to be assumed that the same amount of land will be cultivated in every succeeding year. The amount of irrigable land belonging to each party, rather than the amount of land already under cultivation, would be properly made a controlling element in adjusting their respective rights to the flow of the stream; otherwise a readjustment would be necessary whenever either party should cultivate a greater or less area. The finding of the court that "the only method by which the plaintiff can be given the reasonable use of said stream is to divide the flow of the stream by time, and allow him full flow of the stream during such time as may be reasonable," furnishes the principle upon which this portion of the judgment rests; and the further finding that "the amount of water required to irrigate such lands of the defendant and of the plaintiff as are properly susceptible of irrigation is the equivalent of a constant flow of 1 miner's inch, measured under a 4-inch pressure, to each 5 acres of said land," gives the basis for the application of the principle in behalf of the respective parties. The judgment protects the plaintiff against any waste or unnecessary diversion by the defendant in case it shall not cultivate its land, or only a small portion thereof, by the provision that, when it shall not actually use all or any portion of said waters upon its irrigable land, the plaintiff shall be entitled to use the same.

The appellant also objects to that portion of the judgment which provides that the defendant may provide means for carrying to the north line of the plaintiff's land, without diminution, all of the waters of the stream in excess of 100 inches which shall at any time be flowing at the point where the stream enters the land of the defendant, and that, if it shall elect to do so, it shall have the right, at any of the times during which the plaintiff is by the judgment entitled to the use of the waters of the stream, to deliver said excess to the plaintiff at the northerly line of his tract, and that, if it shall so deliver said excess to the plaintiff during the time it shall make such delivery, it shall have the right to appropriate to its own use the said 100 inches. This provision in the judgment is based upon the finding that 100 inches of the water of the stream is lost by absorption and evaporation between the time that the stream enters the land of the defendant and before it reaches that of the plaintiff, and accords with the simplest principles of equity in the adjustment of the respective rights to the waters of the stream. The plaintiff could under no circumstances be entitled to the use of more water than would reach his land by the natural flow of the stream, and, if he receives this flow upon his land, it is immaterial to him whether it is received by means of the natural course of the stream, or by artificial means. On the other hand, if the defendant is enabled by artificial means to give to the plaintiff all of the water he is entitled to receive, no reason can be assigned why it should not be permitted to divert from the stream, where it enters its land, and preserve and utilize, the 100 inches, which would otherwise be lost by absorption and evaporation.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. That persons had not been previously married is not conclusively shown by their procuring the performance of a marriage ceremony between them.
2. A finding of community rights in real estate, unappealed from, whether of fact or of law, by a court having jurisdiction and all the parties before it, although erroneous, is the law of the case and conclusive upon the parties.
3. Jurisdiction to order a partition sale of community property is not defeated by the fact that the husband by will directs the property to be retained until his children reach majority, since his will cannot affect his wife's right to her half of the property.
4. A partition sale cannot be attacked otherwise than by appeal because the notice of sale was published before the decree was actually signed, if the order was made prior to the publication.
5. Guardians of minors, and their attorneys of record in a partition suit, may rightfully admit that the property was community property if that fact has been determined by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter in a prior proceeding which remains unappealed from, even if the finding was erroneous.
6. The question of title to real estate may be tried in a partition proceeding under the Washington Code.
7. Facts sufficient to give jurisdiction of a partition proceeding and suit to try title are shown by allegations of the extent of plaintiff's title, of defendant's title as plaintiff understands it, and that plaintiff and defendant are tenants in common.
8. Minor part owners of common property properly represented in a partition suit may be effectually bound by a decree of sale for partition under the Washington Code.
9. A patent for homestead land will not relate back to the time of making final proof so as to cut out the rights of a woman under a marriage ceremony performed between the two dates, where long prior to final proof she has been living with the claimant as his wife.
10. Land obtained under a homestead claim is in effect taken by purchase within the intent of the Washington community property laws, so that the wife has community rights therein.

The case of KROMER v. FRIDAY holds that a guardian for infants in a partition suit might admit that the property was community property and bind the infants, where such admissions were made in good faith and in no wise contravened the facts as they existed. The fact that the property was community property had been determined by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter in the prior proceeding, which was unappealed from. It was said that it would make no difference whether it was an erroneous finding of fact or of law. Wash. Code Proc. 1881, § 558, provided that a guardian of an infant might consent to a partition without a suit. Section 596 provided for the sale of infant's land on partition, and § 561 provided that the confirmation should conclude all parties to the suit. The present suit was one to vacate and set aside a decree of sale and deed in partition, and such decree was held to be res judicata. (As to the power of guardians, Wash. Code Proc. 1891, § 415 (292), provided that a judgment might be entered on confession by the guardian in the case of a minor if a guardian for the action had been appointed, but this section was not referred to in the opinion.)

The decision of KROMER v. FRIDAY, while apparently exceptional, may be reconciled with other cases by the fact that the interests of the infants were declared not to have been prejudiced by the admissions.

I. By representatives of infants.

a. By pleadings.

The general rule almost without exception is that the representative of an infant has not the power to bind the minor by admissions in his pleadings. The exceptional cases are under statutes, as in Missouri and Oregon. In the latter state the statute is similar to that of Washington, as in KROMER v. FRIDAY.

So, a guardian ad litem has not the power in a suit to prejudice the interests of the infant, in the pleadings, by admitting the execution or consideration of notes in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien against land purchased by his ancestor. Matthews v. Dowling, 54 Ala. 202.

By admitting in a suit for divorce that the infant defendant had defrauded the plaintiff by the marriage. Cooper v. Mayhew, 40 Mich. 528.

By admissions in a suit to subject land held by the infant to a judgment against his father, and a decree without sufficient proof in such a case is erroneous. Cochran v. McDowell, 15 Ill. 10.

By an answer consenting away the rights of infants and their inheritance, and such answer cannot be used against the infant. Daingerfield v. Smith, 83 Va. 81.

By an answer in a partition suit admitting away the rights of the infants. Waterman v. Lawrence, 19 Cal. 210, 79 Am. Dec. 212.

By admitting anything to sustain an action against an infant; but he may accept short notice of trial, as N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1218, requiring twenty days to elapse between the appointment of a guardian and the entry of the judgment, does not apply where judgment is not taken by default. Newins v. Baird, 19 Hun, 306.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Andrew F. Burleigh, Ronald & Piles, and Lichtenberg, Shepard, & Lyon, for appellants:

The infant appellants by this suit directly, not collaterally, attack the partition decree in the court that rendered it.

The infant plaintiff, Victor E. Kromer, is the owner of the land in fee and in severaity, subject to a trust. He holds it by purchase, not by descent. His estate and title thereto vested in him under the will of his father and the decrees of the probate court.

The infant's rights are those of a purchaser —not of an heir. As he holds the land under a will, it is a deed and conveyance.

Each of these decrees, though erroneous, which makes improper admissions. Wood v. Truax, 39 Mich. 628.

By admissions in an answer in a suit to set aside a patent to the ancestor of the infants, as Mansf. (Ark.) Dig. § 4957, provides that no judgment can be rendered against an infant until after a defense by a guardian, and § 5042 provides that it shall be the duty of a guardian of an infant to file an answer denying the material allegations of the complaint prejudicial to such defendant. Driver v. Evans, 47 Ark. 297.

By his concessions, as Gantt's (Ark.) Dig. § 4578, provides that he shall deny every material allegation prejudicial to the infant. Pillow v. Sentelle, 39 Ark. 61.

By adopting an answer made by the infant's ancestor while living, which does not put in issue every material fact, as Gantt's (Ark.) Dig. §§ 4578, 4595, provided that the guardian ad litem can admit nothing in his answer, the burden of proof of which would otherwise be on the plaintiff or complainant. He must put in issue every material fact. Evans v. Davies, 39 Ark. 235.

So, a guardian cannot prejudice the interests of his ward by adopting an answer filed by an administrator de bonis non, denying nothing of his own motion. A guardian of an infant should put in issue and require proof of every material allegation of a complaint prejudicial to the infant, whether it be true or not. He can make no concession on his own knowledge. Pinchback v. Graves, 42 Ark. 222.

Nor can he do so by an answer admitting a parol contract for a conveyance of land to have been made by the ancestor. Or by an agreement of his solicitor that the case may be heard on bill and answer. Prutzman v. Pitesell, 3 Harr. & J. 77.

The effect of admissions is controlled by the same principles as the power to admit, and the minor is not bound by admissions in pleadings made by his representative, which are prejudicial to the interests of the infant.

So, a guardian ad litem did not bind the infant where the answer affected the infant's rights by admitting the truth of the charges made in the bill. McClay v. Norris, 9 Ill. 370; James v. James, 4 Paige, 115; Crain v. Parker, 1 Ind. 374; Taylor v. Parker, Smith (Ind.) 225; Thayer v. Lane, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 200; Reavis v. Fielden, 18 Ill. 77; Stinson v. Pickering, 70 Me. 273; Hough v. Canby, 8 Blackf. 301; Thompson v. Doe, Hare, Id. 336; Hough v. Doyle, Id. 300.

And where the answer was "that he admits the allegations of complainants' bill so far as he knows, but that he knows nothing of his own knowledge," as this did not entitle complainant to a decree against the infant without proof. Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 42 Miss. 155.

And where the answer denied generally such of the allegations as it might be important to controvert, and submitted the rights of the minor to the court, as this amounted to no answer at all and was useless. The guardian ad litem must make a full defense, without regard to the truth of the denials, as to anything which may be prejudicial to the minor. Varner v. Rice, 44 Ark. 236.

And where the answer admitted the existence of a debt of the ancestor, no personalty, and that a sale previously made to pay debts was a judicious one, and ratified it. Crabtree v. Niblett, 11 Humph. 488.

And where the answer admitted that the infant's ancestor owed a debt in controversy. Such answer cannot be read in evidence for any purpose. Bank of Alexandria v. Patton, 1 Rob. (Va.) 499.

And where the answer made admissions prejudicial to the interests of the infants. The case must be referred to the master for proof. Eaton v. Tillinghast, 4 R. I. 276.

And where the answer admitted that the assets of an estate were insufficient to pay the debts, and that the debts were due. Satisfactory proof should have been required to prove these facts before directing a sale of land to pay debts, where the infants were interested. Bank of United States v. Ritchie, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 128, 8 L. ed. 890.

though wrong, aye, though procured by fraud, until reversed by the probate court itself, or an appellate court on a direct appeal from or contest of such decree, as provided for by statute, is binding and conclusive on Mrs. Kromer.

The decree of partition rendered by the superior court of Snohomish county, July 7, 1890, is void.

The court had no jurisdiction, because: (1) The statute was not complied with (a) in the sale and confirmation thereof.

The sale was not advertised for four weeks. Code 1881, § 359; Sadler v. Niesz, 5 Wash. 182; Broder v. Conkling, 98 Cal. 360.

(b) In the partition suit in either complaint, answer, or proof of title.

The interest and title thereof were not fully set forth in the complaint.

Dec. 552.

These statutory provisions must be complied with because the partition statute, as far as it affects the title, is derogatory of the common law.

Elwood v. Northrup, 106 N. Y. 172; Atkins v. Kinnan, 20 Wend. 241, 32 Am. Dec. 534; Battell v. Torrey, 65 N. Y. 294.

At common law title was not passed upon.

The admission by a guardian ad litem and by an administrator in their answer in a former suit, that the complainants in the present suit were heirs and distributees of an estate, cannot be used against the infants to support a decree in the latter suit. Finn v. Hempstead, 24 Ark. 111.

So, a guardian could not bind an infant where a disclaimer of title was filed, in a suit to quiet title, as this was of no effect in the absence of evidence that the interests of the infants were not prejudiced. Isert v. Davis, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 686.

And admissions made in a petition filed by a guardian ad litem claiming a surplus fund for infants, in an action by a judgment creditor claiming a lien on the fund, were not binding against the interests of the infants. Smith v. Smith, 13 Mich. 258.

The court of equity refused to allow infants to maintain a suit by next friend to avoid a deed of trust made by their father on the ground of usury, as this would require payment of the principal and be prejudicial to their interests; and the infants have a remedy by an action to recover the land. Salter v. Embrey (Miss.) 18 So. 373.

A judgment against a minor was not sustained on an ex parte affidavit of his tutor, admitting the essential facts of the case. Aiken v. Gatlin, 48 La. Ann. 877.

And the answer of the administrators that the averments of the bill are true, in a suit against administrators and heirs to enforce a vendor's lien, did not conclude the infants. McIlvoy v. Alsop, 45 Miss. 374.

And an answer of an infant admitting facts in a suit by an assignee of an insolvent against the infant, attacking a conveyance in trust for the infant as fraudulent, could not be read as evidence against such infant. Holden v. Hearn, 1 Beav. 445.

In Long v. Mulford, 17 Ohio St. 484, 93 Am. Dec. 638, it was said that the court will not suffer a minor to be prejudiced either by the admissions of his guardian ad litem or by his laches.

In Berrett v. Oliver, 7 Gill & J. 191, and Cavender v. Smith, 5 Iowa, 187, it was said that it is the duty of a court of equity to see that the rights of the infants are not prejudiced or abandoned by the answers of their guardians.

In Chaffin v. Kimball, 23 Ill. 36, and Walton v. Coulson, 1 McLean, 120, it was said that the answer of a guardian ad litem admitting the truth of the charges in the bill could not affect the infant's rights.

In Tucker v. Bean, 65 Me. 352, it was said that a guardian ad litem cannot bind the rights of an infant, by consent, and the answer of a guardian that he knows nothing of the matter, leaving the plaintiff to prove his case if he can, is not sufficient.

In Quigley v. Roberts, 44 Ill. 504, it was said that a guardian cannot admit the allegations of a bill so as to bind the infant.

In Price v. Crone, 44 Miss. 571, it was said that temore v. Shaw, 8 N. H. 397; Forder v. Davis, 38 Mo. 115; Martin v. Walker, 58 Cal. 590; Hancock v. Lopez, 53 Cal. 370.

The land being held subject to such trust, it could not be partitioned.

Fraud upon the court in obtaining the partition decree avoided it.

By omitting the terms of the will and the decrees of the probate court, Friday concealed material and important facts from the court. By alleging the respective interest of all these minors contrary to the terms of the will, Friday misrepresented vital facts. This concealment, this misrepresentation, was fraud.

the answer of an infant cannot be excepted to for insufficiency, nor can any admission made by him be binding. The rights of an infant will not be permitted by the court to be prejudiced by any omission of the guardian ad litem.

In Reddick v. State Bank, 27 Ill. 148, it was said that no confession by the guardian of an infant could bind him.

In Ralston v. Lahee, 8 Iowa, 17, 74 Am. Dec. 291, it was said that an infant is not bound by the admissions of her guardian ad litem.

In Ashford v. Patton, 70 Ala. 479, where the guardian ad litem answered that he believed the facts set forth in the several paragraphs of said bill were true, it was said that if, in dereliction of duty, the guardian should file an answer admitting the allegations of the bill, every material fact must be proved.

In Sconce v. Whitney, 12 Ill. 150, it was said that it is the duty of the court to exact of the guardian a vigorous defense of the infant's interests.

In Hiatt v. Brooks, 11 Ind. 508, it was said that an answer of a guardian would not be evidence against the heirs in a suit by them against an administrator to recover for misapplication of effects.

In Enos v. Capps, 12 Ill. 255, it was said that an answer of a guardian ad litem admitting the allegations of a bill to be true would not dispense with the necessity of proof.

In Leving v. Lady Caverly, Prec. in Ch. 229, an answer of a superannuated defendant, put in by his guardian, was allowed to be read in evidence against him, differing from the case of an infant because the infant mends and is to have a day to show cause after he becomes of age, but the other grows worse and is to have no day.

Where the answer of the guardian admitted facts prejudicial to the infants, and it was claimed that the case was heard on the answer without testimony, the presumption was that there was evidence, either in the exhibits or otherwise, to warrant the court in finding that all the allegations of the petition were true. Rankin v. Kemp, 21 Ohio St. 651.

In Mills v. Dennis, 3 Johns. Ch. 367, where an order of reference was made to the master for an order of sale of an infant's property to be reinvested and to pay the debts, it was said that the plaintiff must also prove his debt before the master, in the same manner as if nothing had been admitted by the answer.

In Lloyd v. Kirkwood, 112 Ill. 329, it was said that if the infant is defending and his guardian has failed to file some pleading essential to the admission of his defense, or has filed one so imperfect as not to be sufficient for that purpose, it is the duty of the court, whenever the fact is disclosed, to see that the proper pleading is filed.

In Freeman v. Russell, 40 Ark. 56, it was said that the guardian ad litem must put in an answer denying all material allegations of the bill.

In Thompson v. Doe, Hare, 8 Blackf. 336, where the guardian ad litem filed an answer admitting the allegations of the petition, the order of sale was erroneous but not a nullity, and the purchase was valid.

In Greenman v. Harvey, 53 Ill. 386, it was said that a guardian cannot confess a bill against his ward.

In Stephenson v. Stephenson, 6 Paige, 353, it was said that a guardian ad litem could not put in an answer which could be used as evidence either for or against the infant.

In Rhoads v. Rhoads, 43 Ill. 239, it was said that nothing can be admitted, but everything must be proved against an infant.

In Wells v. Smith, 44 Miss. 296, it was said the minor is incapable of making admissions or waiving her rights.

But in English v. Savage, 5 Or. 518, the admissions of the guardian ad litem in his answer, to the effect that the guardian had given bond sufficient to entitle him to a sale of the minor's property, bound the infant in a subsequent suit to set aside a sale, as a judgment against an infant was only voidable on the same grounds as might be used by an adult. Besides, under the provisions of Or. Code, p. 156, the doctrine of "parol demurrer" was not recognized in this state, and under Or. Code, §§ 248 and 251, a guardian ad litem had full power to bind an infant defendant by admissions, even to confessions of a judgment. (This section only provides for confession of judgment.)

In Collins v. Trotter, 81 Mo. 275, where the answer of the guardian of mutes (defendants) admitted the signing of the note sued upon, but claimed they were of unsound mind, it was held that Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 3653, providing that the execution of the note sued upon is admitted by failure to deny the same under oath, does not apply to persons of unsound mind, and the guardian can admit nothing in his answer that will bind the infant. But the failure to object to the introduction of the note in evidence is an admission that binds the ward, as Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 5795, 5804, providing that the guardian shall give bond and prosecute and defend all actions, place the guardian in such a position that his admission will bind the same as if acting in his own right.

See infra, VI. for persons of unsound mind.

As to admission, see Johnson v. McCabe, 42 Miss. 255, infra, I. b.

By guardian ad litem, see Guy v. Pierson, 21 Ind. 18, infra, II. b.

b. By consent decrees.

The power of representatives of minors to bind them by consent judgments or decrees has been denied where the interests of the infant were prejudiced.

So, the power to bind an infant and prejudice his rights was denied where a guardian pro forma for an infant plaintiff and heir, in a suit for specific performance of a contract to convey land, consented that a decree be made conveying the land to another party. A court of chancery will not permit the rights of an infant to be sacrificed though the consent of a guardian be given. Walton v. Coulson, 1 McLean, 120.

And where an order was made directing that funds be paid to solicitors of general guardians out of a surplus in a foreclosure sale. General guardians do not represent infants for any purpose in such a litigation as this, and, whether proper parties at all or not, their solicitors are not authorized to act so as to bind the rights of the infant. Guardians ad litem are appointed for this purpose, but they cannot bind the infants except in strict accordance with the rule framed for their protection. By chancery rule 94 no money can be turned over to the general guardian without taking new security, unless a showing is first made that the security is adequate. Sheahan v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 42 Mich. 69.

And where a statutory guardian of minors consented to a decree, as Fla. Code, § 1783, provided that a guardian could not borrow money and bind his ward, or by any contract bind his ward's property or create a lien thereon. Braswell v. Downs, 11 Fla. 62.

And where the attorney for a guardian ad litem consented that a judgment might be taken against the infant defendant. Litchfield v. Burwell, 5 How. Pr. 341.

And where the attorney for infants consented to a decree. Bennett v. Bradford, 132 Ill. 269.

And where the attorney for infant plaintiffs agreed to a dismissal of the suit. This did not affect the infants or estop them from afterwards suing upon the same cause of action. A next friend can only claim and pursue the rights of a minor, and is powerless to yield or cede them to others, and the same is true of their attorney. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 70 Ill. 350.

And where a guardian ad litem withdrew his answer pleading nonassumpsit and infancy, and agreed to a judgment by default against the infant. Peak v. Pricer, 21 Ill. 164.

And where a guardian ad litem of an infant plaintiff of his own motion made an absolute settlement

Under the law of notice, applied to the records and proceedings, also to the conduct and acts of the parties, the defendants and intervener acquired no estate or title in and to the land, but the same remains vested in the infant plaintiff as sole owner.

of the whole matter in controversy. The authority conferred upon him is to prosecute, and not to settle. Edsall v. Vandemark, 39 Barb. 598.

And where a guardian ad litem stipulated that "a final decree should be entered in the cause for the plaintiff upon the trial and evidence adduced in the other cause tried by the court, in which a decree was entered for plaintiff, the evidence and points of controversy upon the title being substantially similar,"—it was said a guardian ad litem has but one duty, and that is to defend the action. It is unnecessary to say that when there are several actions pending between the same parties, involving precisely the same fact, the guardian may not agree to submit the whole upon the single examination of witnesses, or, which is in effect the same thing, that the decision of one shall decide the whole. Such an agreement may be consistent with his duty, but that is not this case. McClure v. Farthing, 51 Mo. 109.

And where a guardian ad litem consented to a decree in partition and to a compromise of the infant's rights in such decree,—especially where the court had not jurisdiction in such a case to make partition. Stansbury v. Inglehart, 9 Mackey, 134.

And where the guardian ad litem of the infant defendants consented to the granting of an order for the mortgage of the infants' real property, the decree could be attacked collaterally. Losey v. Stanley, 147 N. Y. 560.

Neither the guardian ad litem nor any other person has power to waive proof or to consent to any decree against an infant; and an answer "that he knows nothing of the matters and things in complainant's bill, and not confessing or admitting, etc.," is not an answer of the infant as it should be, but is a personal answer of the guardian. Johnson v. McCabe, 42 Miss. 255.

The effect of consent by a representative of minors to decrees and judgments is governed by the same rule as the power to bind, and judgments or decrees which are prejudicial to the minor and taken by consent alone will not bind him.

So a decree against a minor cannot be rendered upon the agreement of his guardian that the allegations of the bill are true, as an infant is not bound by the agreement. Gooch v. Green, 102 Ill. 507.

And minors are not bound by a decree in foreclosure rendered by consent of their guardian, where their title was under a trust deed prohibiting any lien to be created on the property, and the mortgagee had notice of such trust deed. Taylor v. Franklin Sav. Bank, 50 Fed. Rep. 289.

And the court will not make a decree by consent where infants are concerned, without first referring it to the master to ascertain whether it is for their benefit. But it was said that when once a decree has been pronounced without that previous step, it is considered as of the same authority as if it had been referred to the master and he had made a report thereupon that it would be for their benefit. Dow v. Jewell, 21 N. H. 470; Wall v. Bushby, 1 Bro. Ch. 484.

But the mere statement on the face of a decree directing sale of an infant's property, that there was consent, does not operate to show that the decree was based on that alone; and it will be presumed that there was a reasonable exercise of discretion intended for the benefit of the minor. Bent v. Miranda (N. M.) 42 Pac. 91.

An agreement by a guardian ad litem and an administrator in a suit, admitting that the title of the land in suit was in other parties, will not render the judgment therein void on a collateral attack because no evidence was adduced. It was said that "it may be true that a guardian ad litem cannot consent to a judgment against the minor, or an administrator against the estate, so as to waive proof, and that a judgment so obtained is erroneous," but the "judgment cannot be held void because it was agreed to as stated." (The question in this case arose upon the objection to the judgment being offered in evidence.) Hollis v. Dashiell, 52 Tex. 187.

"If an infant suffer a decree against him by consent, he may at any time reverse it for that error of his being an infant; otherwise if he be defendveyed to him was that of "formerly Emma Kromer and wife of Erskine D. Kromer, deceased,"—was a fact that put Friday on "due inquiry."

A decree appearing upon its face to have been made, not upon the consent of the defendants and the guardian ad litem merely, but upon the representation of counsel and adjudication of the court that it was a decree fit and proper to be made as against the infants, will be binding upon them. As to consent, see Gronfier v. Puymirol, 19 Cal. 629, infra, II. c.

c. By agreement.

The same rule applies to stipulations and agreements concerning pending suits, as to admissions in pleadings, although there are exceptional cases on questions of practice and peculiar statutes.

So, a guardian had no authority and did not bind the infant by an agreement prejudicial to the infant, where such guardian stipulated as to the facts in a suit for partition. Claxton v. Claxton, 56 Mich. 557.

And where he agreed to a statement of facts that adverse parties had made improvements in good faith believing themselves to be the true owners of the land; and this rule also applied to their attorneys. McCloy v. Arnett, 47 Ark. 445.

And where he consented to a distribution, although 2 N. Y. Stat. at L. 97, § 72, provided that on final settlement of an executor or administrator a surrogate may order, upon the consent of the parties in writing, the delivery of undisposed assets among the parties. Carman v. Cowles, 2 Redf. 414.

And where he submitted a controversy to the court on an agreed statement of facts. Fisher v. Stilson, 9 Abb. Pr. 33; Lathers v. Fish, 4 Lans. 213.

A general guardian and a guardian ad litem had no power to consent to the relinquishment of their land for public improvements under an order of the court on their petition asking for power to abandon the land, as the only mode of devesting infants of their title to land was by proceedings pursuant to the Revised Statutes for the sale of infants' estate, and N. Y. Laws 1883, chap. 319, authorizing the city to take land for the opening of a street on consent in writing of the owners, did not authorize the taking of an infant's land by such consent. Battell v. Burrill, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 97, Affirmed, 50 N. Y. 13.

And the administrator of a guardian who has entered up a judgment bond given to the guardian as guardian had no power thereafter to release the lien of a judgment to the prejudice of the interests of the ward. Brown v. Thompson, 156 Pa. 297.

And the guardian had no authority and could not bind the infant by releasing an agent of the adverse party from liability for a tort, in order to render such agent a competent witness. Fraser v. Marsh, 2 Stark. N. P. 41.

So, a guardian ad litem had no authority and did not bind the infant where such guardian ad litem excuted a release in favor of a party defendant in order to render him a competent witness, and at the same time perpetrated a fraud on the court by taking from the witness a new note depending for its validity on the success of the suit. Walker v. Ferrin, 4 Vt. 523.

And where he waived cross interrogatories, and stipulated that the answers to the interrogatories might be read by the referee, and that the referee might proceed in the case without further notice to him. Litchfield v. Burwell, 5 How. Pr. 341.

And where he agreed to a stipulation not authorized by the ward, who had just come of age, which permitted facts occurring since the filing of the original and so-called supplemental bills to be introduced in evidence as if a new supplemental bill had proceeding or any other to decide an issue involving a trial of title.

Under the homestead law, the land was E. D. Kromer's separate and sole estate because it was a gift to him from the United States government.

Cooke v. Bremonde, 27 Tex. 457, 86 Am. Dec. 630; Noe v. Card, 14 Cal. 577; Fuller v. Ferguson, 26 Cal. 547; Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal. 514; Scott v. Ward, 13 Cal. 459; Wilson v. Castro, 31 Cal. 420; Reynolds v. West, 1 Cal. 323; Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564; Wilkinson v. American Iron Mountain Co. 20 Mo. 128; Freem. Whether the land under homestead law was acquired as a gift or by purchase Erskine D. Kromer's estate and title vested in him at the date of making his final proof and payment.

At the date of making the final proof and payment Kromer was unmarried, though living with the Indian woman who afterwards became his wife. They were not husband and wife, the marriage taking place subsequent to such proof and payment.

been filed, as it attempted to bind without authority an infant just come to maturity concerning transactions during minority, wherein neither guardian nor attorney had any implied power, and which stipulation did not indicate what kind of facts were to be given in evidence as a ground of recovery. Turner v. Jenkins, 79 Ill. 228.

And where he stipulated in an action that it should abide the event of another action which had been tried in the same court and was then pending on appeal in the supreme court. Eidam v. Finnegan, 48 Minn. 53, 16 L. R. A. 507.

Under Mo. Rev. Code 1855, § 12, p. 1232, requiring the answer to deny the material allegations in the petition or to deny any knowledge or information of the matter alleged sufficient to form a belief, the omission by a guardian ad litem to comply with this statute will not prejudice the infant. It was said that the courts will never permit a guardian ad litem to do any act, or make any admission, or enter into any agreement or stipulation, which tends in any degree to prejudice or compromise the infants' rights. Revely v. Skinner, 33 Mo. 98.

In Kingsbury v. Buckner, 134 U. S. 650, 33 L. ed. 1047, it was said that it is undoubtedly the rule in Illinois, as elsewhere, that a next friend or guardian ad litem cannot by admission or stipulation surrender the rights of the infant. The court whose duty it is to protect the interests of the infant should see to it that they are not bargained away by those assuming or appointed to represent them.

In Hitt v. Ormsbee, 12 Ill. 166, it was held that, "as to the infant defendant, the case is still more defectively made out. As to him, nothing can be admitted, but everything must be proved. Beyond the admissions of the answers, there is no evidence that the premises were purchased with the funds of Ormsbee." The suit charged the ancestor with obtaining a conveyance in fraud of the grantor's creditors, and the answers referred to were those of adults, and the case does not show that the infant answered.

A judgment in a friendly suit by a minor where his attorney was employed by the defendant in a case for personal injuries, submitted without a jury or evidence, does not bind the infant, as an infant is not bound by the admission of anybody. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Elder, 50 Ill. App. 276, Affirmed, 149 Ill. 173.

An agreement for delay by an attorney appointed by an infant would not bind the infant, as an infant cannot appoint an attorney. Lang v. Belloff, 53 N. J. Eq. 298.

The consent to a reference by an attorney representing an infant defendant, where no guardian ad litem was appointed, does not bind the infant. Gamache v. Prevost, 71 Mo. 84.

And a guardian ad litem cannot consent that evidence against the infant may be taken before an unauthorized person, or that incompetent evidence may be used. Fischer v. Fischer, 54 Ill. 231.

And a guardian ad litem cannot waive the rights of an infant by the admission of incompetent evidence without objection. Cartwright v. Wise, 14 Ill. 417.

In Howell v. Mills, 53 N. Y. 322, it was said that a guardian ad litem could not consent to a collusive arrangement to prevent competition at a judicial sale of land in which the infant had an interest, to the prejudice of such infant.

In Waugh v. Robbins, 33 Ill. 183, it was said that natural or legal guardians cannot by consent waive the requirement that full proof must be made before a decree can be rendered against infants.

The exceptional cases recognizing the right of a representative of a minor to consent or stipulate in matters concerning suits are those relating to practice, in which cases the rights of the minor were not prejudiced, or cases controlled by a statute.

A guardian ad litem and solicitor for an infant, appointed after evidence had been taken, had the power to agree to submit the case without ar-

United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 691, 8 L. ed. 547; Scott v. McNeal, 5 Wash. 309.

If the minor devisees represented by the guardian had been possessed of the entire title, the court would have had power under the statutes, upon proper proof, to order a sale as prayed for by the petition. But the showing by the widow of an adversary interest over which the probate court had no power deprived the court of that jurisdiction. The hearing of her objections was a judicial action within the power of the court.

This was a judicial finding of fact necessarily involved in the exercise of jurisdiction to determine the power of the court to hear the original petition. It constitutes an estoppel against appellants from claiming in a subsequent action the entire premises.

And infants are bound by the guardian ad litem admitting the use of affidavits instead of evidence on interrogatories, where there is no mala fides. Ralston v. Lahee, 8 Iowa, 17, 74 Am. Dec. 291.

The guardian ad litem in a partition suit has full authority to bind his wards by a stipulation in the nature of a waiver of proof, under 2 Wagner (Mo.) Stat. p. 973, § 49, providing that a guardian ad litem in a partition suit has the same power as any general guardian, and § 48, providing that the acts of a guardian in such suit shall be binding. Le Bourgeoise v. McNamara, 82 Mo. 189.

And a minor was bound by an agreement of his guardian with other parties in a partition sale, allowing the payment of the money before the time it was to become due, as Mo. Rev. Stat. § 3346, provided that guardians are authorized to do and perform any matter respecting the division of any lands as herein directed which shall be binding on such ward, as if done by the ward after the disabilities are removed. State, Rice, v. Cayce, 85 Mo. 456.

And a guardian ad litem may consent to the removal of a suit from one circuit court to another, as the court could do by the consent of all the parties what it would have the right to do upon the motion of any one. Lemmon v. Herbert (Va.) 24 S. E. 249.

A settlement made by executors, heirs, devisees, and guardian of infants, on an intricate matter of an estate, was confirmed by the chancellor on a petition by the parties for such confirmation, where such settlement was for the advantage of all parties. Code 1873, providing that chancery causes may, by consent of parties given in open court and entered of record, be submitted to the judge of the court in which such cause is pending, for decree to be made therein in vacation, such a decree will not be set aside, where the guardian ad litem consented and no showing is made that the infant was prejudiced. Morriss v. Virginia Ins. Co. 85 Va. 588.

A guardian ad litem may consent to an appeal to any other grand division, as such consent could not possibly prejudice the substantial rights of the infant, under Ill. Const. 1870, art. 6, §§ 2, 5, 8, providing that appeals and writs of error may be taken to the supreme court held in the grand division in which the case is decided, or, by consent of the parties, to any other grand division. Kingsbury v. Buckner, 134 U. S. 650, 33 L. ed. 1047.

And a guardian ad litem may waive the execution of an appeal bond on an appeal to the supreme court of Illinois, without affecting the jurisdiction of the supreme court. Ibid.

The plaintiff, having been admitted by the court to prosecute as next friend for the infant in an action for a legacy, may discharge this judgment, and it will be a bar to any future action for the legacy. Miles v. Boyden, 3 Pick. 213.

In Tillotson v. Hargrave, 3 Madd. 494, it was said that the solicitor of infants could bind them by his conduct as though they were adults. But the court refused to allow the master to use affidavits on a reference, although this was the matter admitted by the solicitor.

In Eidam v. Finnegan, 48 Minn. 53, 16 L. R. A. 507, it was said that one cannot admit "that concessions or admissions such as are ordinarily made in the progress of a cause, and which are entirely consistent with good faith, and which it is frequently for the interest of a party to make, may not be made by the guardian."

mending a sale was concurred in by a guardian ad litem and confirmed, and sale made, the infants were bound.

In an action of accounting filed by a minor, a written statement made before the master as to the disputed items, where the minor was represented by guardian in person and by solicitor, binds the minor as to the making up of the issues on the account. Patterson v. Johnson, 113 Ill. 559.

As to agreement, see McClure v. Farthing, 51 Mo. 109, supra, I. b.

The waiver by omissions of a representative of an infant to make a material issue in the pleadings, or to insist upon proper claims, or to complete the issues, will not prejudice the rights of the minor. But there are some exceptions, to the extent that the infant is bound by the rules of variance and joinder of defenses, and where the statute concludes all parties. This note is not intended to include cases of ordinary default judgments or decrees pro confesso. Such cases hold that an infant cannot be bound by the failure to plead.

So, a minor is not bound where his guardian fails to insist upon a legal defense of the statute of frauds apparent on the face of the record. Grant v. Graigmiles, 1 Bibb. 203.

And where the guardian ad litem does not question the jurisdiction of the court by his answer. Bowers v. Smith, 10 Paige, 193. See Jones v. Jones, infra.

And where a guardian ad litem fails to make a defense in his answer against a petition by executors for authority to make a mortgage. Curtis v. Ballagh, 4 Edw. Ch. 635.

And where a guardian ad litem fails to deny in his answer all the material allegations of the petition prejudicial to the infant. Brenner v. Bigelow, 8 Kan. 496.

And where a guardian failed to pray for judgment for interest in an action against executors who retained the infant's money for several years without excuse. Stephens v. Van Buren, 1 Paige, 479.

And where a guardian ad litem fails to answer after demurrer has been sustained to his answer, as this will not authorize a judgment against an infant for want of answer without evidence. Richards v. Richards, 17 Ind. 636.

And where the guardian ad litem failed to make a defense that could have been legally availed of. Stark v. Brown, 101 Ill. 395.

And where an infant fails to reply, as this is not an admission of the facts charged in the answer, and does not dispense with proof. Legard v. Sheffield, 2 Atk. 377.

But in Thurston v. Nutton, 3 P. Wms. 238, note, it was held that the failure of an infant to reply to an answer authorizes the answer to be read in evidence against the infant, as the defendant is deprived of the opportunity of examining witnesses to prove his answer.

And infants are not excepted from the provisions of N. Y. Code, § 149, providing that matters of confession and avoidance must be set up in the answer; and such evidence cannot be admitted in favor of the infant under an answer of general denial by a guardian ad litem. Roe v. Angevine, 7 Hun, 679.

And under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1577, providing that when a sale in partition has been confirmed by final judgment it shall be binding and conclusive and bar those persons from right and title, the failure of the guardian ad litem to make a defense that could have been made in such a case will render him liable in damages, and this is the only remedy. Reed v. Reed, 46 Hun, 212.

In the case of infants, it has been erroneously thought that it is merely necessary to put in what is called a common infant's answer, submitting his rights to the protection of the court; but that is not so, for, in reality, the preparation of an infant's answer may in some cases require great consideration. He may have a defense, yet at the hearing it may be found impossible to make it effectual, in consequence of its not having been properly raised and the proper facts put in issue by his answer. Lane v. Hardwicke, 9 Beav. 143.

And where the answer of the infant did not put in issue all the allegations of the bill for a sale of land, it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence from the record, that sufficient evidence was introduced upon the trial. Wells v. Smith, 44 Miss. 296.

A guardian ad litem will be held to have waived, by answer, the fact that a bill of complaint was not signed, where the objection is first made in the supreme court, as it is a mere irregularity and a question that pertains to practice; and the rights of an infant defendant will not be considered prejudiced if the guardian ad litem answers without suggesting the omission, which will be equivalent to an express waiver. Turner v. Jenkins, 79 Ill. 228.

Some cases hold that the omission of the guardian ad litem to act in matters affecting the interests of the infant do not bind the minor. But in regard to questions of practice it would seem that inaction should be controlled by the same rules as agreements, for which see supra, c.

That the infant defendants, who were made new parties on an amended bill, did not object to reading the evidence taken on the original bill, will not justify an order that this evidence be read as against the infant. Quantock v. Bullen, 5 Madd. 81.

Mere nonaction of a guardian ad litem who had no notice of the taking of testimony will not be construed as a waiver of the infant's rights, whether relating to the practice or substance of the defense. It was said that the guardian ad litem cannot admit away any of the substantial rights of the infant. Turner v. Jenkins, supra.

But the failure of the guardian ad litem to question the jurisdiction of the court in prematurely rendering a decree against infants will not waive their rights. Jones v. Jones, 56 Ala. 612. See Bowers v. Smith, 10 Paige, 193.

The waiver of the right by infants to take a personal decree on the admission of assets by an executor, and the taking of a decree for an accounting, will not bind them. Wall v. Bushby, 1 Bro. Ch. 484.

As to omission, see Cartwright v. Wise, 14 Ill. 417, and Revely v. Skinner, 33 Mo. 98, supra, c.

II. By appearance.

a. By attorney.

An attorney cannot waive service of process on an infant. Evans v. Davies, 39 Ark. 235.

And cannot enter the appearance of minor heirs who were not brought into court by proper summons of notice. Bonnell v. Holt, 89 Ill. 71; De La Hunt v. Holderbaugh, 58 Ind. 285.

And cannot appear for an infant defendant and waive service of process, under Kan. Code, §§ 77, 78, providing for personal service and publication of service of process. Armstrong v. Wyandotte Bridge Co. 1 McCahon (Kan.) 166.

So, a general appearance by the defendants by counsel will not bind infants who are not served with process. Valentine v. Cooley, Meigs, 613, 33 Am. Dec. 166.

And an infant defendant is not bound by an appearance of attorneys employed by his natural guardian to defend for him, where such infant was not notified and no person was appointed by the court to make his defense. Priest v. Hamilton, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 50.

A minor defendant can only appear by guardian. An agreement by an attorney cannot be made to operate as an appearance for him. Russell v. Texas & P. R. Co. 68 Tex. 646.

In Clarke v. Gilmanton, 12 N. H. 515, it was said that infants could not appoint an attorney to appear for them, and could take no step to conclude their interests by acknowledging that service had been legally made.

In Mercer v. Watson, 1 Watts, 330, it was said that an attorney could not enter an appearance for an infant defendant.

In Bird v. Pegg, 5 Barn. & Ald. 418, it was said

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs have appealed from a decree of the superior court of Snohomish county dismissing their complaint, and adjudging, in effect, that they have no title to the property in controversy, which is a certain tract of land of about 147 acres, in the present city of Everett. The complaint set up title in fee in the plaintiff Victor E. Kromer, with subsidiary interests for a limited period in his three sisters, Emma and Mattie Kromer, who were joined as plaintiffs, and Alice Kromer, who declined to join as plaintiff, and was made a defendant. The title is claimed by the plaintiffs through their deceased father, Erskine D. Kromer, by will. The complaint attacks, and seeks to vacate on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction and fraud, a decree of sale and deed in partition in said court under which the defendants Rucker and Hewitt and the Everett Land Company, intervener, claim title in fee to certain interests in said land, and joins the defendants Friday, Holland, and Plaskett, on account of their connection with said partition and participation in the alleged fraudulent proceedings. The answers of the defendants Rucker and Hewitt, with their counterclaims, and the intervening complaint of the Everett Land Company, set up the validity of the partition proceedings which originated in an alleged community right in the lands in controversy in the widow of Erskine D. Kromer, who is the defendant Emma Holland. The material facts relating to the matters in controversy are as follows: On May 3, 1870, said Erskine D. Kromer made a homestead filing upon the land aforesaid, situate in Snohomish county, Wash. It is claimed that he was at that time a single man, but at or about said time (the exact time not being material) a certain Indian woman, who had previously been known by the name of Emma Kanouke, and who was thenceforth known as Emma Kromer, came to live with him as his wife, and continued to live with him until his death, in 1885. The plaintiffs and said Alice Kromer are their children. On October 26, 1876, said Erskine D. Kromer made the requisite proofs of his capacity to file and compliance with the laws of the United States relating to such homestead entry. On December 21, 1876, he and said Indian woman appeared before a justice of the peace of said county, and had a marriage ceremony performed. On December 30, 1876, a patent for said land was issued to him. At his death he left the following will, purporting to devise the land in controversy: "I will, bequeath, and devise to my beloved son, Victor E. Kromer, the land upon which myself and family reside, situate in said county of Snohomish, Washington territory, to wit, lots numbered 1 and 2, the S. E. ¼ of the N. W. ¼, and the N. W. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of sec. 30 in T. 29 N. of R. 5 E., containing 147 acres and 55-100 of an acre. It is my will and desire that my family be not separated, and it is my intention that that a judgment against an infant on an appearance by an attorney is error.

In Winston v. McLendon, 43 Miss. 254, it was said that an infant could not waive any part of a formula of service of process, by constituting an attorney to appear for him.

But in Rogers v. McLean, 10 Abb. Pr. 306, it was said that a committee of a lunatic infant residing in the state of New York may, without service of summons on the lunatic, cause an appearance to be entered and a guardian appointed for him, which is at least doubtful.

Some cases do not show whether the minor was served with process or not, but hold that an appearance of an infant defendant by an attorney is erroneous.

So, an attorney cannot appear for and bind an infant defendant where there is no guardian ad litem appointed. Gamache v. Prevost, 71 Mo. 84; Timmons v. Timmons, 6 Ind. 8; Mockey v. Grey, 2 Johns. 192.

And cannot appear for a married woman in an action of assumpsit against a baron and feme where she is an infant, because she ought to appear per guardianum. Freeman v. Boddington, Vent. 185.

So, an appearance of an infant defendant by an attorney is not binding. Cruikshank v. Gardner, 2 Hill, 333; Somers v. Rogers, 26 Vt. 585.

And such an appearance is error. King v. Marborough, Cro. Jac. 303; Bird v. Orms, Id. 289.

And an appearance entered by a plaintiff for an infant defendant by an attorney is irregular, and the proceedings may be set aside. Nunn v. Curtis, 4 Dowl. P. C. 729.

A judgment was set aside where the infant defendant appeared by attorney and obtained a judgment of non pros., as the defense should have been made by guardian. Comstock v. Carr, 6 Wend. 526.

And an infant defendant appearing only by attorney is not bound, and the judgment will be vacated on audita querela as to him, and also as to others. Starbird v. Moore, 21 Vt. 529.

In Bailey v. McGinniss, 57 Mo. 362, it was said that infant defendants could not appear by attorney.

In Goodridge v. Ross, 6 Met. 487, it was admitted that a general appearance by an attorney for an infant defendant did not bind him.

In Peak v. Shasted, 21 Ill. 138, 74 Am. Dec. 83, it was said that a minor can only appear and defend by a guardian, and not in person or by attorney.

In Bloom v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 131, 37 Am. Dec. 299, it was said that at common law an appearance by attorney for an infant defendant, instead of by guardian, would render the judgment void.

In Bedell v. Lewis, 4 J. J. Marsh. 562, it was said that an infant cannot defend an action by an attorney without the aid of a guardian ad litem.

But some cases hold that a judgment against an infant who appears by attorney, and not by guardian, is not void, but voidable. Barber v. Graves, 18 Vt. 290.

And that an infant appeared and defended by attorney, and not by guardian, can only be taken advantage of by writ of error coram nobis. Meredith v. Sanders, 2 Bibb, 101.

An infant executor in an action brought against him appeared by attorney where he ought to have appeared by guardian, and it was resolved by the court that this was error, for this doth much concern the infant, inasmuch as by his false plea he shall be bound to answer of his own goods if he hath no goods of his testator, and therefore under the statute he hath a remedy against his guardian for filing a false plea. Wescot v. Cotton, Popham, 130.

Where process was served on the infant, who appeared and defended by an attorney, the judgment was not void, but voidable. Townsend v. Cox, 45 Mo. 401.

my said son, Victor E. Kromer, shall not sell or dispose of said described premises until each of my daughters shall become of full age, viz. Alice Kromer, Mattie Kromer, and Emma Kromer, and that they shall each have the privilege of residing upon said premises until they shall each become married, provided they should marry before they shall have arrived at the age of majority; and it is my desire that the rents, issues, and profits of said described premises shall go to support my said son and daughters, hereinbefore mentioned, until said girls shall have become married or arrived at the age of majority, at the expiration of which time my said son, Victor E. Kromer, is hereby empowered to dispose of said premises as he shall see fit. . . . Third. I give and bequeath unto my wife, Emma Kromer, the sum of $200, which my executor is hereby authorized to pay at my death. And it is my will and desire that my said wife, Emma Kromer, reside upon the premises hereinbefore mentioned and bequeathed to my said son, Victor E. Kromer, until her death or marriage. . . . I nominate and appoint my respected friend J. H. Plaskett my executor, and authorize him to administer upon my estate, and to execute this will, without giving bond, and without any direction or control from any court, and without notice to creditors or otherwise." This will was probated September 10, 1885. Said J. H. Plaskett qualified as executor, and a copy was filed in the auditor's office for record in October, 1885. On September 23, 1885, said Plaskett was appointed guardian of the persons and property of said children, and has ever since served as general guardian of their persons and property. On October 25, 1886, the final account of said Plaskett as executor was allowed by the probate court, and distribution made of the real and personal property willed by the deceased. There is some contention as to whether the widow was a party to this proceeding, but we do not regard it as material, and the plaintiffs practically concede that it is not. On December 14, 1889, said Plaskett, as guardian, filed a petition in the probate court, praying for the sale of the real estate in controversy, alleging such facts as the statute required to authorize a sale by a guardian of his minor ward's real estate. It was claimed that the real estate was unproductive and that there were no funds to pay the taxes thereon or to support the children, and that it would be for the advantage of said children to have the same sold. Upon the hearing of this petition, on January 27, 1890, the widow of Erskine D. Kromer, who had previously to that time married one Holland, appeared and filed objections to the order, and asked for partition, claiming, among other things, that the land in controversy was community property of herself and said Erskine D. Kromer, and that she was entitled to one half thereof, as the surviving spouse. The probate court found against her, and entered an order directing a sale of all of the land. On January 28, 1890, she filed a notice of appeal from said order

And in such a case the objection that a judgment was taken against an infant could only be taken advantage of by writ of error, and the judgment is in full force until reversed. Marshall v. Fisher, 1 Jones, L. 111.

The appearance of counsel without protest, on behalf of an alleged lunatic on an inquisition, and the failure to show that notice was not received by the person in question, will prevent setting aside the inquisition on the ground that notice was not sufficiently given, where one copy was actually given to the attorney, and another to the person having custody of the alleged lunatic, to whom access for the service of the notice was refused. Re Lindsley, 46 N. J. Eq. 358.

b. By guardian ad litem.

It is a general rule that a guardian ad litem cannot enter the appearance of a minor defendant where process was not served on the defendant. To this there are some exceptions, chiefly in regard to the point of practice in taking advantage of the error, and there are some early Ohio cases which held a contrary doctrine, and cases where the record did not show their age, or they were bound by lapse of time.

A guardian ad litem cannot enter the appearance of a minor defendant so as to waive the service of process and give the court jurisdiction. Chambers v. Jones, 72 Ill. 275; Pugh v. Pugh, 9 Ind. 132; Wheatley v. Harvey, 1 Swan, 484; Taylor v. Walker, 1 Heisk. 734; Ingersoll v. Mangam, 84 N. Y. 622; Hickenbotham v. Blackledge, 54 Ill. 316.

And cannot by consent make his ward a party to the suit. Dist. Hannum v. Wallace, 9 Humph. 129, where it was held that a guardian ad litem might waive the service of a copy of a declaration in ejectment on himself, but could make no other concessions. Frazier v. Pankey, 1 Swan, 75.

And cannot waive the service of process and appear for infants, unless the heirs are present in court, and their appearance will not be presumed. Robbins v. Robbins, 2 Ind. 74.

And cannot bind the minors by an admission that notice was given to them of proceedings to sell land. Donlin v. Hettinger, 57 Ill. 348.

In Abdil v. Abdil, 26 Ind. 287, it was said that the guardian ad litem cannot waive service of process on the infant.

An infant not served with process is not bound where a guardian ad litem enters an appearance and answers. Genobles v. West, 23 S. C. 154; Dodge v. Foulks, 11 B. Mon. 179; Collard v. Groom, 2 J. J. Marsh. 487; Good v. Norley, 28 Iowa, 188.

And where a decree is rendered on an answer of a guardian ad litem, an infant is not bound by admissions improvidently made for him by his guardian ad litem. Wells v. Wells, 6 Ind. 447.

And where a guardian ad litem answers and consents to the prayer of the petition, as this will not dispense with notice. Robertson v. Robertson, 2 Swan, 197; Young v. Young, 91 N. C. 359.

And where the record does not show he was cited, but the guardian ad litem appeared and by his answer admitted the allegations of the bill. Guy v. Pierson, 21 Ind. 18.

And where the minor is not before the court and the guardian ad litem answers, in a suit to sell land to pay debts of an ancestor. Crippen v. Crippen, 1 Head, 128.

And where a guardian ad litem answers in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, as this does not give an appearance or give the court jurisdiction over him; distinguishing the former Ohio cases in suits by administrators to sell land to pay debts, as those decisions rest on the peculiarity of the proceeding, and the statute, and on the ground that the administrator was the representative of the estate, of the creditors, and indirectly of the heirs. Moore v. Starks, 1 Ohio St. 369.

and judgment of the probate court. This appeal was heard in the superior court of Snohomish county on the 24th day of March, 1890, whereupon the court found and adjudged as follows: "The court finds that the real estate described in the petition of said guardian for an order of sale thereof, and which said probate court ordered to be sold as prayed for in said petition, is community property, and, as such, the said appellant Emma Holland, formerly widow of Erskine D. Kromer, deceased, is entitled to the undivided one half thereof; and that the said probate judge or probate court had no right to order the sale of the entire property, or any part thereof, in the manner in said transcript shown. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by this court that the order of sale and judgment rendered by said probate court below is reversed, set aside, and held for naught." But the court made no finding or order as to a partition.

It is contended that the court could not have found upon the facts that said parties were husband and wife prior to the marriage ceremony which was performed between them by the justice of the peace, and that said ceremony was evidence that they were not married prior thereto. There is no doubt that it was some evidence of the fact that the parties had not been previously married, but it was not conclusive. Said parties may possibly have entertained a doubt as to the validity of a previous ceremony, and may have wished to set that doubt at rest by such subsequent ceremony. It does appear that they had lived and cohabited together, and held each other out as husband and wife, for a number of years. It is true this would not constitute a marriage under the laws of the territory, but it was some evidence of marriage; and, in making his homestead proofs, said Kromer testified that he was the head of a family, and submitted the affidavits of two of his neighbors that he was a married man. The parties were all before the probate court in said proceedings, brought by the guardian for authority to sell the land for the purposes therein set forth, for a better investment of the proceeds, etc., and were likewise before the superior court upon the appeal therefrom by the widow; and the court having found therein that said Erskine D. Kromer and said woman with whom he was living were lawfully married, and that the land was the community land of said parties, and there having been no appeal prosecuted therefrom, that decree must stand, if the court had jurisdiction to make the finding. And it would make no difference whether it was an erroneous finding of fact or of law. It would be the law of the case as applied to the lands in question, and conclusive upon the parties. The jurisdiction of the court to find that said parties were husband and wife, and that the land was community property, is strenuously attacked by the plaintiff, and contended for by the defendants. It raises a most important question as to the power of the former probate courts of the territory

And where a guardian ad litem, "being present in court, said nothing in bar or preclusion of the plaintiff's action." This means that he neither assented to the appointment nor appeared for the wards; and it is the duty of the court to see that he accepts the appointment or appears for the minor. Greenup v. Bacon, 1 T. B. Mon. 108.

And where a guardian ad litem was appointed and answered, the infants can attack the judgment collaterally, as the statute requires service to be made. Moore v. Starks, supra. See Benson v. Cilley, infra.

So, a decree was erroneous where a guardian ad litem answered for minors who had not been served with process. Campbell v. Campbell, 63 Ill. 502.

But some cases refuse relief on account of the manner of attack and on account of particular statutes. The earlier Ohio cases held that an appearance by guardian ad litem would bind the infants.

So, a decree against infants having no notice, but whose guardian ad litem answered, is erroneous, but not void. Bank of United States v. Cockran, 9 Dana, 395; Bustard v. Gates, 4 Dana, 436; Emeric v. Alvarada, 64 Cal 529; Preston v. Dunn, 25 Ala. 512.

And it will be presumed that infants were properly before the court where they answered by guardian ad litem, in the absence of any other showing in a collateral attack. Horner v. Doe, State Bank, 1 Ind. 130, 48 Am. Dec. 355.

And an appearance by guardian ad litem where infants were not served with notice was held binding as against a collateral attack, although it might be ground for reversal. (This was under the Ohio practice.) Nelson v. Moon, 3 McLean, 321. See Benson v. Cilley, infra.

A decree is not void when the record shows that the infants were not served with process, but on their motion a guardian ad litem was appointed who answered for them, as Geyer's (Mo.) Dig. p. 305, provided that if they were over fourteen years of age they could appear and select their guardian, and these may have been of that age. Day v. Kerr, 7 Mo. 426.

And a decree of sale was not set aside where the minors answered by guardian ad litem, and the record did not show that the infants were served with process, but the wards acquiesced for twenty years and did not complain of the decree. Hopper v. Fisher, 2 Head, 256.

An acknowledgment of service by the guardian ad litem was binding on the infants where the proceedings were had under the law of Ohio prior to the statute of 1840. This latter statute prohibited a waiver of notice by a guardian ad litem in behalf of his ward. Benson v. Cilley, 8 Ohio St. 604. See Moore v. Starks, supra.

And a judgment was sustained where the infant was not served with process, but a guardian ad litem was appointed, who accepted service of process on petition, releasing all errors and defects of service, and admitted the facts set forth to be true. Robb v. Irwin, 15 Ohio, 689.

In Snevely v. Lowe, 18 Ohio, 368, it was held that an appearance by a guardian ad litem without service of process on the infants was binding on them. See Rogers v. McLean, 10 Abb. Pr. 306, infra, VI.

c. By guardian.

There is some conflict of authority as to the power of a guardian to appear for his ward without service of process on the ward. Some cases hold that he has the power and that the ward will be bound, on the general theory that he has recourse on the guardian if he has been prejudiced; and some hold that an appearance by the guardian will bind where the minor is served with process.

So, the general guardian of an incompetent and insane defendant has the power to appear in the

and of the superior courts of the state upon such appeal. The fact that the proceedings were had in the probate court while we were under a territorial form of government, and in the superior court of the state after statehood, might have some bearing also as to whether the latter court, upon the appeal, was limited by the powers possessed by the former court. A decision of these questions is not necessarily involved in this case, as we view it, and we shall refrain from deciding them at the present time, but have set forth the facts as having some bearing upon the later proceedings

Subsequent to the foregoing, and on April 7, 1890, said widow executed and delivered to defendant Friday a quitclaim deed of her undivided one half of the land. On May 12, 1890, said Friday began an action for partition in the superior court of Snohomish county, alleging, in substance, in his complaint, the filing upon the lands in controversy by said Erskine D. Kromer and his compliance with the United States homestead laws; that during all of said times he was a married man, and that his wife, said Emma D. Kromer, lived with him upon said land; that he died testate; that the children aforesaid were the issue of said marriage, and were living at the time of his death; the appointment of the said Plaskett as guardian, the interests of the children therein to an undivided one half of said lands, and his ownership of the other by virtue of the conveyance from the widow; that the land was so situated and its condition such that a division could not be made without great prejudice to the owners; and praying that the court ascertain and determine the interests of each of said parties, and that partition thereof be had, and in case it could not be made, etc., then that the land be sold, and the proceeds paid to the several owners in proportion to their respective interests. Summons was issued upon this complaint, and was personally served upon all of said children and upon said Plaskett as guardian. On June 6, 1890, a firm of lawyers appeared for said defendants, and filed a general demurrer to the complaint. It does not appear what disposition was made of this demurrer; but on the 3d day of July, 1890, an answer was filed in that action, denying the sale by the widow to the plaintiff, Friday, and that the real estate was so situated that it could not be divided without great prejudice to the owners, and, by way of counterclaim, set up the payment by them of taxes for several years upon all of said land, and that one half of said sums was a just claim against the interest and claim of the plaintiff, etc. On the 3d day of July, the court rendered the following decree:

This case coming on by agreement of the parties hereto on this 3d day of July, 1890, before the Honorable J. R. Winn, judge of said court, at his chambers in Snohomish city, in said county and state, the plaintiff appearing by Craddock & Miller, his at-action without service of the summons upon the ward. Redmond v. Peterson, 102 Cal. 595.

And an appearance and defense by a natural guardian was held binding on the infant, although the minor was not served with process. Wrisley v. Kenyon, 28 Vt. 6; Smith v. McDonald, 42 Cal. 484.

Under Cal. Guardian Act, April 19, 1850, § 16, providing that a guardian shall appear for and represent his ward in all legal suits and proceedings unless where another person is appointed for that purpose as guardian or next friend, such guardian has the right to represent the infant in a suit to settle a partnership estate and for the sale of the same. In this case the guardian consented to a reference to try the issues and report a judgment, but the question of consent was not discussed in the opinion. No service of summons was made on the infant. Grouflier v. Puymirol, 19 Cal. 629.

An appearance of minor defendants by the general guardian in proceedings to sell land of an intestate's estate is binding. Ewing v. Hollister, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 138; Ewing v. Higby, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 198, 28 Am. Dec. 633.

And a guardian may waive the service of process for infants even where realty is involved. Scott v. Porter, 2 Lea, 224.

And a guardian's accepting service and waiving process gave the court jurisdiction over the minors and their estate, and a subsequent majority of the wards did not oust the jurisdiction, where the guardian had not ceased to act. Simpson v. Belvin, 37 Tex. 674.

A general guardian had the authority and bound the infants where he appeared, although the service of process was irregular, under Or. Code, p. 556, § 20, providing that every guardian appointed to defend shall appear for and represent the ward in all suits, unless another person is appointed for that purpose. Ankeny v. Blackiston, 7 Or. 407.

The general guardian of a minor may waive process and answer for him. Masson v. Swan, 6 Heisk. 450; Cowan v. Anderson, 7 Coldw. 284.

And a judgment is not erroneous where a guardian appeared and consented to the orders made preparatory to the hearing of the cause, and assumed the management of the cause for the infant defendant, who was not before the court by service of process, as the guardian became responsible to the infant for the faithful performance of the trust. He might admit the charges in the bill. Banta v. Calhoon, 2 A. K. Marsh. 167.

So, an appearance and defense of an infant defendant by a natural guardian binds the infant. But it was said that an appearance by an attorney would not bind him. In this case process was served on the infant. Fuller v. Smith, 49 Vt. 253.

But some cases hold that the guardian cannot bind the ward by waiver of service of process and by entering an appearance.

So, a guardian cannot waive service of process and enter the appearance of the infant. Greenman v. Harvey, 53 Ill. 386.

And cannot admit service of process for the minor. Clark v. Thompson, 47 Ill. 25, 95 Am. Dec. 457.

And cannot enter the appearance of an infant where an order of revivor must be served, and a decree in such a case is error. Haley v. Taylor, 39 Ark. 104.

And cannot waive personal notice required to be given to them, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1843, p. 523, providing for notice to minors in proceedings to sell their real estate. Doe, Platter, v. Anderson, 5 Ind. 34.

In Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Campbell, 62 Mo. 585, it was held that a guardian or an infant is incompetent to acknowledge service for the infant. The case does not show which was done.

torneys, and the defendants appearing by Frater & Ault, their attorneys, and said minor defendants also appearing by J. H. Plaskett, their guardian, and the court, being fully advised in the premises, finds from the pleadings and evidence submitted the following:

Findings of Fact:

(1) That prior to the 30th day of December, 1876, one Erskine D. Kromer, having complied with the laws of the United States, became the owner in fee simple of the following described property, to wit: Lots one (1) and two (2) and the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter (N. W. ¼ of N. E. ¼) and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter (S. E. ¼ of N. W. ¼) of section No. thirty (30), in township No. twenty-nine (29) north, of range No. five (5) east, Willamette meridian, situated in Snohomish county, state of Washington; and on said last-mentioned date a patent was issued to said Kromer under the homestead laws of the United States of said lands. That, prior to that time, said Kromer resided upon said tract, and had entered the same as a homestead upon public lands, of the United States. That the said Erskine D. Kromer was a married man, and thereafter, while residing upon said lands, and during all the time of his said residence upon said tract, was there living with his wife, Emma D. Kromer. (2) That on or about the 8th day of August, 1885, the said Erskine D. Kromer died, testate, in said county, and in the then territory and now state of Washington and that the above-described tract of land was a portion of the estate of said decedent. (3) That, at the time of the death of said Kromer, there were living, as the issue of his said marriage, the following children, to wit, Victor E. Kromer, Emma Kromer, Mattie Kromer, and Alice Kromer, who has since intermarried with one Lloyd Allen, who are heirs at law of said Erskine D. Kromer, deceased. That the only other heir at law of said decedent is his said wife, surviving him, whose name at the time of his decease was Emma D. Kromer, but who has since remarried, and who is now, and has been for a long time past, Emma D. Holland, wife of Samuel S. Holland. (4) That, prior to the commencement of this action, the said Emma D. Holland, for a valuable consideration, sold and by deed duly conveyed, to the plaintiff herein, an undivided one half (½) interest in and to all of the above-described tract of land; and that the said plaintiff is now the owner of said undivided one half of said real property, and is in possession thereof. (5) That, after the death of the said Erskine D. Kromer, the above-named defendant J. H. Plaskett was duly appointed guardian of the persons and estates of the above minor children of the said Erskine D. Kromer and Emma D. Kromer, his wife, and duly qualified as such, and, ever since the time of his said appointment, said J. H. Plaskett has been, and now is, the guardian of the said minor children. (6) That said plaintiff and said minor children and heirs at law of said decedent, viz., Victor E. Kro-

d. By curator ad hoc.

A curator ad hoc cannot waive a citation. Ticknor v. Calhoun, 28 La. Ann. 258.

And cannot waive service of process for a minor. Cormier v. De Valcourt, 33 La. Ann. 1168.

And cannot bind his clients as to the statute of limitation, by waiving the citation. Hill v. Barlow, 6 Rob. (La.) 142.

And has no power to appear for the defendant until he is regularly cited, and cannot consent to a judgment binding him. Carpenter v. Beatty, 12 Rob. (La.) 540.

A counsel appointed to defend an absent debtor cannot bind him when he is not properly before the court. Stockton v. Hasluck, 10 Mart. (La.) 472.

Generally trustees cannot bind the cestui que trust by admissions and waivers that are prejudicial to the interest of the trust estate. Some cases hold that they have the power to make concessions, or consent, where the same is made in good faith and the interest of the cestui que trust is not prejudiced.

So, a trustee defendant cannot make admissions in a suit to the prejudice of the trust fund and against the cestui que trust. Bragg v. Geddes, 93 Ill. 39.

And a trustee of a public trust or his attorney had no power to consent to a decree which took the trust out of the other trustees and placed it in other hands. Vose v. Internal Imp. Fund, 2 Woods, C. C. 647.

And a trustee selling land under execution and accepting redemption money from a creditor having a subsequent execution against the same party does not affect the title to the land, as his position will not allow him to make any admission to the prejudice of the trust fund and against the cestui que trust. Thomas v. Bowman, 29 Ill. 426.

The admissions of a mere trustee, the plaintiff of record, made after the suit was commenced, were properly excluded in evidence. It was said the rule was different at common law. Sargeant v. Sargeant, 18 Vt. 371.

In Davies v. Ridge, 3 Esp. N. P. 101, it was said that an admission of one of several trustee defendants, that he had trust money in his hands, would not bind the other trustees. The case does not show whether the admission was made before or in a suit.

In Bailey v. Boyce, 5 Rich. Eq. 187, it was said that an infant devisee having no guardian ad litem is not bound by a decree, where an answer was filed in her name by the trustee appointed by a will.

But a trustee in a deed for a married woman has the power to represent the interest of his cestui que trust on a foreclosure of a prior mortgage, and in the decree may waive the provisions of Md. Code, § 125, art. 16, giving a day to pay the mortgage debt. He cannot conclude her right in the decree where the cestui que trust is not before the court by process. Johnson v. Robertson, 31 Md. 476.

And the trustee of a railroad mortgage in a foreclosure suit had the power to stipulate and consent to a decree, where there was no bad faith, and the same was not set aside at the suit of a minority of bondholders. The fact that some of the trustees were holders of bonds secured by their trust was not of itself sufficient to make them incompetent to consent to a decree. Shaw v. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. 100 U. S. 605, 25 L. ed. 757.

A trustee of a railroad mortgage authorized only to collect the mortgage by litigation, at the request of the holders of the majority of the bonds, was authorized to release the errors and waive the right of an appeal, where the majority of such holders desired the litigation to cease. Elwell v. Fosdick, 134 U. S. 500, 33 L. ed. 998.

mer, Emma Kromer, Mattie Kromer, and Alice Allen, are the owners and tenants in common of the above-described tract of land, as follows, to wit: The said plaintiff, Frank P. Friday, has an estate in said lands to the extent of an undivided one-half part or interest in fee thereof; the said minor defendant, Victor E. Kromer, has an estate of inheritance in said real estate, to the extent of an undivided one-half (½) part or interest in fee thereof; and the other minor defendants, Emma Kromer, Mattie Kromer, and Alice Allen, have a contingent interest in said real estate above described, to the extent of the right of said minor defendants Emma Kromer, Mattie Kromer, and Alice Allen to live, reside, and remain on an undivided one-half part thereof until they become of lawful age, or until they become married. (7) There are no liens or encumbrances on said lands appearing of record, and that no person other than the said plaintiff and the defendants hereinbefore named have any interest in said lands as owners or otherwise. (8) That said real estate is so situated and its condition is such that a partition thereof cannot be made without great prejudice to said owners. (9) That said defendant J. H. Plaskett, as guardian, has paid the taxes on said lands for the years 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, and 1889. And, upon the above and foregoing findings of fact, the court finds the following conclusion of law: That said premises should be sold, and the proceeds arising from the sale thereof be divided according to the respective rights of the parties hereto, as found by the court; and that an order of sale issue therefor. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, in accordance with the foregoing findings of facts and conclusion of law, that the said real estate be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, in the manner prescribed by law, upon the following terms, to wit: One half of the purchase price to be paid cash in hand on the day of the sale, the balance in two equal instalments, payable in nine (9) and eighteen (18) months, respectively, with interest on the deferred payments at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, and secured by mortgage on said premises; and that A. W. Hawks, Esq., be, and he is hereby, appointed referee to sell said real estate, and of his proceedings hereunder to make due return.

Notice of sale of the land was posted and published by the referee appointed to make the sale, and the same was sold to said Friday for the sum of $13,000, on August 2, 1890. A stipulation was thereafter entered into between the parties relative to certain security taken for a portion of said sum, and the sale was duly confirmed; and thereafter, on the 21st day of August, 1890, the referee, pursuant to such proceedings and sale, executed and delivered a deed of the land to Friday, which was, on the 25th day of said month, duly approved by the court. On the 28th day of November, 1890, Friday executed a deed of an undivided one half of this land to the defendants Rucker; and on the same day executed and delivered to defendant Henry Hewitt, Jr., a deed of the other un-

IV. By executors and administrators.

There appears to be some conflict of authority on the question as to the power of an executor or administrator to bind others than themselves by admissions or waivers. Some of the cases are controlled by local statutes, and the powers of executors and administrators are generally defined by the statutes. Some cases affirm the right of such representative to make binding admissions, but they must have been made in good faith, and to have been within a prudent exercise of the discretion imposed on such representatives. The cases in regard to admissions, where suits were not pending, are not intended to be included in this note.

An administrator has power to bind the estate by consenting to a judgment for a just claim, under Mich. Rev. Stat. § 7396, providing that an administrator allowing a judgment against him by default establishes evidence of the debt to be paid in course of administration. If he can bind the estate by default, he may by consenting to a judgment. Shelden v. Warner's Estate, 59 Mich. 444.

And minors and distributees are bound by a decree taken by consent of an administrator representing such parties, where there is no collusion. Barclay v. Kimsey, 72 Ga. 725.

An executor may compromise a lawsuit and buy the peace of the estate he represents, and extinguish doubtful claims against it, provided he acts discreetly and in good faith. Meeker v. Vanderveer, 15 N. J. L. 392.

An administratrix in an action for wrongfully causing the death of her husband, brought for the benefit of the heirs as well as for her own use, has the power to stipulate that the case may be dismissed and compromise the suit, without procuring an order of the probate court; and Ill. Stat. (Starr & C.) chap. 3, § 83, requiring an order of the probate court for settlement, does not apply, as this is not a claim due the estate within the meaning of that section, and recovery is for the benefit of the widow and next of kin. Washington v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 136 Ill. 49.

An administratrix may release a claim after she has brought suit thereon, and the release will be binding if there is a dispute as to the validity of the claim, and the release is made in good faith. Higginson v. Second Nat. Bank, 59 Hun, 183.

Under Vt. Gen. Stat. chap. 48, § 39, providing that when there shall be a disputed claim against an executor or administrator such claim may, with the consent of the parties in writing, be referred, and the award when accepted by the court shall be final, such an award is res judicata. Barker v. Belknap's Estate, 39 Vt. 168.

On a reference of a claim against an estate under the Vermont statute a stipulation that all claims, whether accrued before or after the death of the intestate, might be heard and determined by the referee, was binding. McDaniels v. McDaniels, 40 Vt. 340.

An answer to the merits by executors is a waiver of the right to plead in abatement, which binds their successor. Russell v. Texas & P. R. Co. 68 Tex. 646.

And the administrator may waive the inquisition and condemnation of land levied upon under a judgment against him, as land is treated and sold as a chattel for payment of debts. Hunt v. Devling, 8 Watts, 403.

A waiver of sci. fa. by an executrix after a sale, and a ratification of the proceedings, filed nunc pro tunc, cured all supposed defects, although Pa. Act Feb. 24, 1834, § 33, Pamph. Laws, 79, literally construed, required a writ of sci. fa.; but under Pa. Act June 13, 1836, Pamph. Laws, 578, an amicable action of sci. fa. could be entered nunc pro tunc. Diese v. Fackler, 58 Pa. 109. But see Bomberger v. Raymond, infra.

divided one half, which interest was subsequently conveyed by Hewitt and wife to the Everett Land Company. No appeal was taken from the decrees of the superior court in any of the foregoing proceedings by any of the parties interested or at all, and the same remained unquestioned until the commencement of this action, in December, 1891.

Many points have been raised and argued in the case which we think unnecessary to pass upon, owing to the conclusion we have reached with regard to others; and, before proceeding to discuss the matters of law involved in the various proceedings, we wish to dismiss the charge of fraud as utterly unfounded, as, after an examination of the argument with reference thereto, contained in the 660 odd pages of briefs filed in this case, and the evidence upon which it is based, found in the three large volumes of the record, we are satisfied that all parties, including the courts and the guardian, acted in entire good faith in the premises. A lengthy discussion of the questions raised with reference to this feature of the case would serve no good purpose. The several proceedings must be viewed in the light which surrounded them at the time they were had; and although the land in question has now become very valuable, by reason of the fact that a prosperous city is being in part built thereon, and that several hundred thousand dollars have been expended in improvements upon the same by the purchasers and their grantees, all of which have been projected and done since the sale under the partition proceedings, it is apparent that, at the time the land was sold thereunder, it brought a high price, which was due in a measure to an unsuccessful "boom," that was independent of the matters which have since given value to the land. Even though the parties purchasing had an undisclosed purpose of platting a town site thereon, and were endeavoring to obtain the land for that purpose, it is apparent that the same would not have been carried out if the supposed title had not been procured; and, had it not been for these subsequent developments, undoubtedly the sale would have been regarded as a fortunate one, and the proceedings would not have been questioned.

Although Erskine D. Kromer, in his will, sought to provide for the retention of the land until his daughters had arrived at the age of majority, the court clearly was not deprived of power to order a sale thereof in the partition proceedings if the land was community property, as the will would only operate to convey the title to a one-half interest. The land at that time was practically in a wilderness, and was unproductive, and was, it seems, in danger of being sold for taxes, and there were no funds available for the support of the minors. It was as much the intention of the deceased parent that the children should be supported during their minority as it was to preserve the land intact. However, as to this feature of the case, it is sufficient to say that the land was not sold upon the application aforesaid of the guardian of the plaintiffs, but was sold by

But other cases hold that admissions by such parties are not binding.

In Bomberger v. Raymond, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 280, it was held that a foreign administrator cannot consent to the issue of an execution upon a judgment against his intestate, without a previous scire facias as required by Pa. Act Feb. 24, 1834, § 53, Purdon, 529, prohibiting an execution unless the representatives have been warned by a writ of sci. fa.,—especially where an administrator has been appointed within the jurisdiction, and refuses his assent, and asks that the execution be set aside. This case seems to conflict wth Diese v. Fackler, supra, but the decision is on the ground that the power of a foreign administrator is questionable.

So, in an action of ejectment to recover a leasehold estate, brought by infant heirs in the name of an administrator, he had no power to release both the action and the estate, in consideration of a sum previously received by him on a compromise and surrender by him of the lease, when he had discovered before he executed the release that the estate was not forfeited, but belonged to the heirs, and his subsequent action was wilful and done in fraud. People v. Pleas, 2 Johns. Cas. 376.

And an executor or administrator cannot bind the estate by an agreement with one having a judgment against it and also a judgment against a third party, to submit the questions of liability and the amount on the demands to the circuit court in a single action. Barry v. Davis, 33 Mich. 515.

And an admission of indebtedness, made by one executor after an action has commenced, will not bind the other executor. Hammon v. Huntley, 4 Cow. 493.

So, a judgment against two executors, entered on a fraudulent agreement by one, is not binding and will be enjoined. Nason v. Smalley, 8 Vt. 118.

And an agreement by a personal representative of a decedent's estate to discharge a judgment for a sum less than its amount, not authorized by any court, is void and a note given by the debtor for the amount agreed upon, to take the place of and be a substitute for the whole judgment, is without consideration. Siddall v. Clark, 89 Cal. 321.

As to admissions by administrators, see McIlvoy v. Alsop, 45 Miss. 374, supra, I. a. See also infra, VII.

V. By curator ad hoc.

A curator ad hoc has no capacity to waive prospectively, so as not to require at a subsequent time evidence of the judicial capacity of an officer to whom the commission in the suit might be sent. It was said that upon a specific commission and to save costs and to speed justice, the counsel might have dispensed with proof of those facts in reference to particular persons known to him. Edmonson v. Mississippi & A. R. Co. 13 La. 284.

A curator ad hoc cannot waive the legal rights of the party he represents by omitting to except in the lower court to the want of the proper parties. Hyde v. Craddick, 10 Rob. (La.) 387.

And an attorney appointed by a court to represent nonresidents cannot prejudice their rights by consenting to an introduction of improper testimony. Collins v. Pease, 17 La. 116.

See infra, VII., By confession of judgment.

VI. By representatives of idiots and lunatics.

It seems that the representatives of idiots and lunatics cannot bind them by admissions that are prejudicial to their interests, in the absence of a statute authorizing such consent. There are some cases, however, in which consent was given, which appeared to affirm the power where an idiot was not prejudiced, and where the party complaining was to blame, and where the assent was under a stat-virtue of the independent partition proceeding brought by the alleged owner of the other half interest, against which claimed interest, if well founded, the will could not in any wise operate.

There being no fraud in the premises, the claims of the plaintiffs in this case must be sustained, if at all, on the ground of the invalidity of the various proceedings above set forth, by virtue of which the land was found to be community property, and was sold to the defendants, now claiming it. Questions of estoppel against the plaintiffs, and claims that the defendants, or some of them, are bona fide purchasers without notice, have been presented, which we pass over as immaterial, and treat the case as though all of the defendants had full notice of all the foregoing proceedings.

In the proceedings brought for a partition of the land by virtue of which it was sold, the court had jurisdiction of the plaintiffs in this case, and of the subject-matter. It was there found that Friday owned a one-half interest in the land, and its sale was ordered, and had accordingly. These proceedings are attacked on the ground that the statute was not complied with in advertising the sale. The first publication of the notice of sale was made on the 3d day of July, and the decree was not signed until the 7th. As a matter of fact, however, the finding of the court had been made prior to the publication, and the point raised is nothing more than an irregularity, which would not affect the jurisdiction of the court in the premises. It could only be taken advantage of by an appeal in the proceedings, if at all, and none was taken.

Complaint is also made that the guardian and attorneys of record for the plaintiffs herein admitted in that proceeding that the land in controversy was the community property of said parents; and it is contended that they had no right to make such admission, and that the same is an evidence of bad faith and of fraud in said proceedings. It must be borne in mind that this last proceeding was in the same court which heard and disposed of the appeal from the order of sale made by the probate court on the application of said guardian to sell, and the same judge was presiding. All parties were acting in a measure in view of said former proceeding; and that proceeding, even if invalid, throws a strong light upon the good faith of all parties whose acts are now questioned. We are satisfied that such admissions were made in entire good faith, and were such as the parties had a right to make and the court was justified in acting upon; and, furthermore, that they in no wise contravene the facts as they existed, independent of such former proceedings. Witnesses were examined in this case as to what took place, what was admitted, and what testimony was introduced in such former proceedings; and the judge before whom they were had was called and testified, and said that he based his judgment on what he supposed was sufficient to justify the decree which he signed. There is no testimony in this record tending to ute, and where the judgment of lunacy had not been obtained.

The conservator of an insane defendant cannot waive objection to an incompetent witness against the ward. Huling v. Huling, 32 Ill. App. 519.

And a guardian of an insane widow cannot waive the homestead rights of the ward. Ratcliff v. Davis, 64 Iowa, 467.

The committee of a nonresident lunatic appointed by the laws of another state cannot appear for him in the courts of New York, or have a guardian ad litem appointed, without service of process. Rogers v. McLean, 10 Abb. Pr. 306.

A committee of a lunatic has no right to bring an action of covenant for him, and such judgment is not a bar to an action brought by a lunatic. Where an idiot sues or is sued he must appear in his proper person, and anyone who prays to be admitted as his friend shall be admitted to prosecute or defend. But a lunatic, or one who becomes non compos mentis, must appear by guardian if within age, and by attorney if of age. Cameron v. Pottinger, 3 Bibb, 11.

An agreement (between a lunatic by his next friend and the committee of the lunatic) in the form of a consent decree, not signed by the judge, discharging the committee from liability, but that he should provide for maintenance of the lunatic, does not prevent the lunatic from demanding from the committee an account of the estate. Clark v. Crout, 34 S. C. 417.

But in a partition suit where an infant idiot had not been made a party, the court directed after the sale that she be brought in by supplemental complaint, and, after the appointment of the guardian, it appearing best for the infant, and the guardian consenting, directed the judgment to stand good against her, and the purchaser was bound to comply with his purchase. Rogers v. McLean, 34 N. Y. 536.

A pleading both by guardian ad litem and attorney, after the defendant who was in court had become a lunatic, is not error, and the defendant's attorney cannot complain of the error where he had the guardian ad litem appointed. Walker v. Clay, 21 Ala. 797.

The guardian of an insane widow may file his written consent that her interest in real estate may be sold, when a petition has been filed by the executor of her deceased husband for the sale of real estate to pay debts, as Ind. Stat. 2 Gavin & Hord, p. 507, § 77, provides that adult persons may waive notice by filing their assent to the sale in writing, and that guardians may assent in like manner for their wards, and page 575, § 8, provides that this statute is applicable to guardians of the insane persons. Smock v. Reichwine, 117 Ind. 194.

A decree by consent of counsel of a party in fact a lunatic but not adjudged such, is a bar to a subsequent suit to assert in his behalf the same rights which were set up in the former suit, when there is no fraud. Royston v. Horner, 75 Md. 557.

Defendants non compos mentis but not idiots from nativity, and of full age, were allowed to appear, plead, and defend by attorney, in Faulkner v. M'Clure, 18 Johns. 134.

In Re Heller, 3 Paige, 199, where an idiot was sued for destroying a schoolhouse on land in which he had an interest, and the plaintiff offered to compromise by a conveyance from his committee of one half of the lot, and the committee acquiesced in the application, and submitted the rights of the infant to the chancellor, the matter was referred to the master to report if the partition was equitable.

In Tomlinson v. Devore, 1 Gill, 345, a lunatic show that any person connected with the defense of that partition case was not as fully informed of every existing fact connected with the subject-matter of that litigation as this court is capable of being informed by the record before it, and there is absolutely no hint in the testimony that the plaintiff in that case, or any person in his behalf, did anything to mislead the legal representatives of those defendants, or to conceal from them any fact, or did anything in any way to prevent a fair trial. If, as claimed by appellants, the question of title was heard, in part, upon an agreed statement of facts, they were the true facts in the case. Plaintiff's counsel produced in court the deed on which plaintiff relied to prove his title. He also produced in court sufficient testimony to convince the court of the necessity of selling the premises. The sale of the property followed in accordance with the decree of the court. The plaintiff in the partition proceeding was the purchaser. The defendants, through their counsel and otherwise, employed every means to make the property bring the highest possible figure. This commendable zeal had its effect; and the testimony stands undisputed that the sale was in all respects fairly conducted, that there was a lively rivalry between the bidders, and that the land brought the highest estimate of its value.

Partition is a civil action, in contemplation of our Code, and may be used as a form of action to try title. "The rights of the several parties, plaintiffs as well as defendants, may be put in issue, tried and determined in such suit, and where a defendant fails to answer, or where a sale of property is necessary, the title shall be ascertained by proof to the satisfaction of the court before the decree for partition or sale is given." Code 1881, § 558. The Code of California provides that any right, title, or interest in the land may be put in issue, tried, and determined in the action, substantially in the language above quoted from our own Code. The determination of the fact of title by the court is held to be conclusive upon all the parties to the suit. Hancock v. Lopez, 53 Cal. 362–371. "Any questions affecting the right of the plaintiff to a partition, or the rights of each and all of the parties in the land, may be put in issue, tried, and determined in such action. . . . If 'disputes exist as to their rights or interests in any respect, such disputes may be litigated and determined in such action.'" De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 329, 87 Am. Dec. 81; Morenhout v. Higuera, 32 Cal. 290; Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 576, 95 Am. Dec. 139; Nash v. Church, 10 Wis. 303, 78 Am. Dec. 678. This court, in Hill v. Young, 7 Wash. 33, has held that the court has power in a partition proceeding, and is required to determine title. "Such judgment or adjudication is final and conclusive between the parties, not only as to the matter actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have been litigating and have had decided as incident to or essentially connected with the subject-matter of the litigation, and every matter coming within the legitibrought ejectment by his attorney instead of by trustee, and agreed to a statement of facts constituting his title, but the court did not pass on the question of the power to bind, although holding that on the statement of facts no recovery could be had.

As to admissions by representatives of persons of unsound mind, see Redmond v. Peterson, 102 Cal. 595; Collins v. Trotter, 81 Mo. 275, supra, I., a; Re Lindsley, 46 N. J. Eq. 358, supra, II., a. See also infra, VII., By confession of judgment.

VII. By confession of judgment.

As to the power of fiduciaries to bind by a confession of judgment it seems that trustees have not the power unless given by the act creating a trust, and infants cannot be bound by a confession of judgment on a warrant of attorney. As to executors and administrators there is some conflict of authority, some cases holding that they have such power and some cases denying the authority. In regard to insane persons and drunkards the cases appear to sustain the power to confess judgment where the discretion has not been abused.

So, trustees having no power to mortgage or sell the trust property cannot confess a judgment binding upon the property and creating by the voluntary act a lien upon it so that it may be sold and the cestui que trust deprived of the benefit. Huntt v. Townshend, 31 Md. 386, 100 Am. Dec. 63.

And the court in removing a trustee has no right to make an order directing his successor to confess a judgment in favor of the former trustee for an amount due to him for moneys paid and services rendered, and such a judgment is a nullity. Mallory v. Clark, 20 How. Pr. 418.

And a judgment cannot be confessed to one person in trust for another, the trustee and the trust being created and declared in a written statement authorizing the judgment, as, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 383, providing that a judgment by confession may be entered to secure any person against contingent liability, and that if it be for the purpose of securing a plaintiff against contingent liability a statement in writing must show concisely the facts and the amount due, this does not authorize the creation of the trust through which, by the intervention of a trustee as plaintiff, all the contingent liabilities of the debtor might be aggregated and secured. Marks v. Reynolds, 12 Abb. Pr. 403.

A mother as trustee of her minor child cannot bind the child by confession of judgment. Metcalfe v. Alter, 31 La. Ann. 389.

And a judgment on confession, taken on a warrant of attorney given by an infant, is void. Saunderson v. Marr, 1 H. Bl. 75; Bennett v. Davis, 6 Cow. 393; Motteux v. St. Aubin, 2 W. Bl. 1133; Jackson v. Mosley, C. B. Trin. 3 Geo. I., cited in 2 Strange, 1043.

An administrator may, pending a suit in equity, and prior to a decree, confess a judgment at law, so as to give priority. Mactier v. Lawrence, 7 Johns. Ch. 206.

And may confess judgment on an alias sci. fa., and waive an inquisition and agree to a sale on a sci. fa. where the judgment that was revived had been obtained in the lifetime of the decedent. Bennett v. Fulmer, 49 Pa. 155.

A sale under a judgment to a bona fide purchaser was sustained where the judgment was against a decedent and the execution returned "money made," on a sci. fa. after the death of the defendant, an attorney not employed by the administrator pleaded plene administravit and confessed judgment de bonis intestati, and the property in controversy was sold, and the attorney appearing in mate purview of the original action both in respect to matters of claim and of defense." Clemens v. Clemens, 37 N. Y. 59; Bloomer v. Sturges, 58 N. Y. 168; Danaher v. Prentiss, 22 Wis. 311; Tallman v. McCarty, 11 Wis. 402; Wells, Res Adjudicata, §§ 248, 249; Barrett v. Failing, 8 Or. 152; Trayhern v. Colburn, 66 Md. 277; Pray v. Hegeman, 98 N. Y. 351; Blakeley v. Calder, 15 N. Y. 617; Howell v. Mills, 56 N. Y. 226; Sayward v. Thayer, 9 Wash. 22. When the plaintiff alleged the extent of his interest in the property, and the extent of the defendants' interest as he understood it, and showed on the face of his pleading that the parties plaintiff and defendant were tenants in common, he stated every fact required to give the court jurisdiction. Code 1881, § 553.

Appellants seek to avoid the effect of this proceeding by reason of the minority of the defendants in the partition suit, and by reason of the fact that the plaintiff was the purchaser. These defendants had a general guardian, on whom service was made, as well as upon themselves personally. He answered to the suit, and was represented by counsel throughout. The statute expressly provides that the action may be maintained against infant cotenants, the provisions being broad enough to reach any and all interests, and any and all parties, and expressly makes a confirmation conclusive against all parties to the suit. The guardian might consent to a partition without suit under the supervision of the court. Code 1881, chap. 48. "In America, the rule of the common law that infancy does not suspend the right of the adult cotenants to enforce a partition is believed to be of universal obligation. This rule has been held to be applicable to a sale of the property when a division was impracticable. The right of the adults to have the possession of their property, and to have their wishes in the premises gratified, is to be respected equally with the interests of the infants. It would be monstrous to hold that adult part owners should be kept out of the enjoyment of their property merely because the other part owners were infants, and the interests of such infants did not require the property to be sold." Freem. Cotenancy, 2d ed. § 467; Albright v. Flowers, 52 Miss. 346.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, minors properly represented are bound as fully as if they had been majors and personally cited. "Representation in courts of justice is a necessity of civilized society, and the acts or neglects of the representative must in some degree be binding upon the party represented. And persons under disability at the time of a judicial proceeding to which they are parties, represented by their guardians and agents, are bound upon the knowledge of such guardians or agents." 1 Herman, Estoppel, p. 178, § 164; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 5th Am. ed. 163, 164; English v. Savage, 5 Or. 518.

In considering the character of the title as to whether it was community land as a matter of fact, a question is raised as to when the title vested in Erskine D. Kromer. Final proof was made by him before the marriage ceremony aforesaid was performed, but the the case had died. Fetterman v. Murphy, 4 Watts, 424, 28 Am. Dec. 729.

A decree quod computet concludes in the same manner and does not vary at all as to an executor, for before a final decree he may confess a judgment, and does not at all alter the nature of the demand, notwithstanding the words are inserted in the decree "that each party do pay," for these words are only a direction to the master to insert what shall appear to be due upon the balance to either party. Smith v. Eyles, 2 Atk. 385.

Although an executor cannot bind the estate by a note or judgment for a new indebtedness created by himself, he may legally confess a judgment for a debt which he knows was contracted by the decedent. Re Schmidt's Estate, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 17.

The executor may confess a judgment in favor of a creditor, so as to give him priority. Waring v. Danvers, 1 P. Wms. 295.

In Hunt v. Devling, 8 Watts, 403, it was said that an administrator may confess a judgment so as to affect the estate.

In Darston v. Earl Oxford, Prec. in Ch. 188, it was said that it seemed to be admitted that if an executor had confessed judgment at law, a payment on the claim by him would have been good.

But other cases deny the power of such persons to confess judgment.

So, an administrator cannot conclude the estate by a confession of judgment. Finch v. Ragland, 2 Dev. Eq. 137.

And cannot confess a judgment against his coadministrator. Heisler v. Knipe, 1 Browne (Pa.) 319.

And an executor cannot bind his coexecutor by confession of judgment for a debt barred by limitation, although the executors have power to sell and pay the debt. Hall v. Boyd, 6 Pa. 267.

A judgment confessed by an administrator does not bind persons not a party to that suit, and the administrator may show that the assets are exhausted by prior claims. Ruggles v. Sherman, 14 Johns. 446.

Judgment confessed by executors upon debts incurred by them in carrying on the testator's business without authority of the will are their personal debts, and can be collected only from their individual property, and not from any property belonging to the estate. Witmer v. Miller, 9 Lanc. L. Rev. 307.

As to persons of unsound mind, and drunkards, judgments by confession have been sustained.

A guardian of an insane person may confess judgment so as to bind the insane party, as a guardian may allow a judgment nil dicit. McAden v. Hooker, 74 N. C. 24.

And a judgment on confession on a warrant of attorney of a person subsequently found to be of unsound mind will not be set aside where there was no notice of unsoundness of mind, fraud, or want of good faith. But it may be set aside on terms in the discretion of the court. Person v. Warren, 14 Barb. 488.

It is discretionary with a chancellor whether he will set aside a judgment rendered on confession by attorneys of an habitual drunkard after commission found, but the same will not be set aside after the motion was refused in the trial court, unless a showing is made of the injustice of the same. Re McLaughlin, 1 Clarke, Ch. 113.

Matters of arbitration and award, and matters of admissions affecting the party making the same, are not included in this note. This note is not intended to include matters of arbitration or award, or cases involving the question of right of representatives of incompetent persons to maintain actions in their behalf. L. T.

patent was issued thereafter. Although, for certain purposes, the title—at least the equitable title—was earned and accrued upon the making of final proof and receipt of the certificate, the full or legal title did not pass until the patent was issued. The plaintiffs claim that the patent should relate back to the time of making final proof, and that, therefore, the land vested in Erskine D. Kromer as his separate property, if in fact he was not then a married man. Undoubtedly, for certain purposes this would be true, but the doctrine of relation is a fiction of law adopted by courts solely for the purposes of justice. Gibson v. Chouteau, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 92, 20 L. ed. 534. We are of the opinion that it should not be invoked in this case to defeat the claims of the widow. Her equities were as great as those of Erskine D. Kromer or the children. It may fairly be inferred from all that transpired that there was no intentional wrongdoing upon the part of either of said parties, and that they were living together and regarded each other as husband and wife is apparent prior to the marriage ceremony aforesaid; and, if necessary to save her rights in the premises, we are satisfied that we would be justified in holding, and should hold, that, the legal title having passed subsequent to the marriage of the parties, it vested in the community.

A further question is raised to the effect that the title to the land under the homestead laws is taken by gift, and, consequently, that it would become the separate property of the husband under the laws of the territory. There seems to be some conflict in the authorities upon this proposition. As the matters hereinbefore discussed decide this case in favor of the defendants, we will not undertake to enter into any consideration of the cases bearing upon this question, but content ourselves with saying we are satisfied that, within the intent of our laws relating to community property, such land is, in effect, taken by purchase, by reason of the settlement and improvements thereon, in which the wife participates as well as the husband; and, consequently, that this land was the community property of Erskine D. Kromer and his said wife. We adopted this view in the case of Philbrick v. Andrews, 8 Wash. 7; and, although the point was not contested there, we desire to announce our adherence thereto. A contrary holding would be productive of the grossest injustice under the community property laws of this state and territory.

Judgment affirmed.

Dunbar, Ch. J., and Hoyt, J., concur.

Stiles, J., dissenting:

I think the view which the court takes of the actions of the principal respondents in this case is entirely too charitable. The opinion makes it appear as though Friday and the Ruckers had been mere passive movers in the transactions which led up to the practical annulment of the will of Erskine D. Kromer, and the despoiling of his children of the property which their father had devoted, first, to their residence and maintenance, and, lastly, to the use of the son, Victor. Kromer, Sr., died in 1885, and his widow accepted the bequest made to her, and suggested no claim of interest in her for more than four years. Meanwhile the will was proven, administration had, and distribution made in accordance with the terms of the will. In 1889 the Ruckers appeared, and, by their urgency and offers succeeded in moving the guardian to apply for an order of sale. They had already bought up all of the surrounding lands, and were exceedingly anxious to acquire the Kromer tract, which was the key to the situation, commanding, as it did, the principal water front in the present city of Everett. To bring about the application of the guardian to sell, they put $150 into the hands of his attorney, to cover the costs of the proceedings, and agreed to bid $2,000 for the land. The bait took, and the application was made. At this time there was no occasion for selling, as the family had the land to live on, and the guardian had money enough in his hands to last nearly two years. Moreover, there was no legal warrant whatever for selling the land under any circumstances, since its condition was fixed by the will.

The interference of the late Mrs. Kromer had the effect to postpone the proceedings, but her attempt to secure recognition from the probate court was a proceeding without color of legality, since that court had long since lost jurisdiction of the matter of distribution by its final decree of distribution, which was unappealed from. Any order which that court might have made in the matter would have been wholly void. So, also, the appeal to the superior court could and did determine nothing, since on appeal the latter court had no power to determine a matter not within the jurisdiction of the probate court. All that the superior court could do was to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction in the probate court over the subject-matter. The net result of these judicial performances was to leave the entire estate where the will and the decree of distribution placed it, without a valid pen scratch either for or against it. The next operation was the conveyance by Mrs. Kromer to Friday. Now, a great endeavor was made in the course of this voluminous case to show that Friday and the Ruckers were independent individuals, but I am convinced that they were simply shadows of one substance. The Ruckers put up every dollar from first to last, Friday being their instrument and factotum. Next came the partition. Friday presented his petition, the exact language of which will be found in the so-called "finding of facts" quoted in the foregoing opinion. Now, let it be remembered that there had never been any sort of an adjudication that Mrs. Kromer was the owner of one half, or any other interest, in this land. On the contrary, the decree of distribution, which was binding upon her and unappealed from, was squarely against any such proposition. And yet the petition for partition did not mention the will or the decree of distribution, but falsely alleged the ownership of the land and the interests of the children to be as stated in paragraph 6. And, to crown everything, the guardian of these infant children came in and assisted the fraud that was being perpetrated upon the court and his wards, by admitting in the answer every one of these false allegations, without mentioning the actual condition of the title or the will. He did set out some pitiful allegations about payment of taxes, and denied that a sale was necessary; and upon these, as the sole issues, the matter came on for hearing. And of what did this hearing consist? The guardian was there, of course, with his attorney, but there was no hostility in the proceeding. Counsel for the petitioner was there with a witness or two, and findings and a decree already drawn in the exact language of the petition. No question was asked of any witness about any matter other than whether the land could be divided or ought to be sold. The judge who made the decree so testifies, and the findings declare that the alleged facts are found "from the pleadings and evidence submitted." And thus, upon the admissions of the guardian, without trial, and without knowledge on the part of the court that there could be any issue over the title to the land, the decree was rendered, finding that 147 acres of wild land could not be divided into two fairly equal parts, but must be sold. Of course it must be sold! That was the entire object of the scheme from A to Z. And, of course Friday was the purchaser, on time; and he at once conveyed half of his purchase to the Ruckers, and pocketed $6,000 profit within sixty days by a sale to the Everett Land Company. It only remained to carry out this judicial proceeding by allowing the attorney for the guardian $500 out of the proceeds of the sale of these infants' lands, and giving the Ruckers an execution against them for the $150 advanced to start the guardian's application to sell. If these be fair dealings between fair men and infants, then Heaven help the children of the state when they fall into the hands of rogues!

The following legal propositions, I maintain, should have all been decided in favor of the appellants: (1) The full equitable title to the land having been acquired by Kromer before his marriage, it was his separate property. (2) Mrs. Kromer was bound by the decree of distribution, unless in some direct proceeding she asserted her interest. (3) The probate proceedings and appeal were void. (4) It was beyond the power of a guardian to admit away the title of his ward by answer in a partition proceeding. A guardian in such a case is not called upon to answer further than to put his opponent upon proof of every allegation. It has been held always and everywhere that while, upon the trial of a case, a guardian or his attorney may admit probative facts, neither of them can admit ultimate facts, and to do so is a fraud upon the ward. Formerly, and even now, in some of the states, an infant might, after coming of age, set aside a decree for error even; and fraud, either in fact or law, is a just ground for such relief. Bank of United States v. Ritchie, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 128, 8 L. ed. 890; Daingerfield v. Smith, 83 Va. 81; McIlvoy v. Alsop, 45 Miss. 365; Curtis v. Ballagh, 4 Edw. Ch. 635; Loomer v. Wheelwright, 3 Sandf. Ch. 135; James v. James, 4 Paige, 115, Price v. Crone, 44 Miss. 571; Tucker v. Bean, 65 Me. 352; Fischer v. Fischer, 54 Ill. 231, Eaton v. Tillinghast, 4 R. I. 276; Chaffin v. Kimball, 23 Ill. 36; Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 42 Miss. 155, Claxton v. Claxton, 56 Mich. 557; Ralston v. Lahee, 8 Iowa, 17, 74 Am. Dec. 291. In Joyce v. McAvoy, 31 Cal. 274, 89 Am. Dec. 172, Judge Sawyer learnedly reviewed the origin and principle of the parol demurrer, and showed it to have no application to the state of California, because there was no statute, and he also found the doctrine not pertinent to the case, because the attack was collateral, and not by appeal or review. But we have a modified statute of parol demurrer in Code Civ. Proc. § 1393, which in subdivision 8 expressly provides for the vacation of a judgment against a minor for error within one year of his coming of age. Under this provision, the question of the title not having been in issue or considered by the court, I maintain that the partition decree should have been set aside, and that matter determined. At bottom, the only point we have to consider here is, Was there error? If there was, the statute regulates the matter by requiring a new hearing. As it is, this court has taken up the original case, and decided it upon equitable grounds which were in no proper way before it. The opinion of the court quotes the partition statute, which authorizes title to be put in issue in such proceedings; but the trouble is that in this case it was not put in issue, the petition of Friday fraudulently concealing from the court the fact that there was any question of title, and the answer of the guardian assisting the fraud by its admissions. Authorities are cited to show that whatever might have been decided in a litigated case will be taken as actually decided; but in partition, unless the defendant answers, title must be shown. Code 1881, § 558. In substance, there was no answer in this case, for what was answered was merely illegal admission. Guardians may consent to partition without suit, as pointed out, under supervision of the court; but in such cases the court is the counsel of the guardian, and must be satisfied that the proposition is fair, the title certain, and the division just. But here the proceeding ought to have been hostile, whereas it was, in fact, collusive. Moreover, the statute does not permit a guardian to consent to partition by sale.

I have not had to pass upon a case which so profoundly impressed me with a conviction of legal wrong as this. Not, perhaps, that a sufficient price was not obtained for this land; but that the door has been opened whereby speculators, casting their covetous eyes upon the property of infants, may be enabled, by seemingly fair propositions, and by holding out tempting offers to guardians, who would rather handle money than be bothered with land, to evade the solemn provisions made by a deceased father for his children. If the courts sit passively and let guardians confess away the estates of their wards in this way, no estate is safe, and a man who makes a will might as well save himself the trouble. Above all, in this case there was absolutely no occasion for causing this land to be sold; for I undertake to say that there is not a tract of land of that size in the state of Washington which cannot be fairly divided into two parts of equal value. The partition proceeding was a sham, initiated by the first approach of Rucker to the guardian with his offer of $2,000, and $150 for expenses; and, if its consummation is ratified, it crowns with success an effort, at a slightly advanced cost, it is true, to evade the law and the last will of Erskine D. Kromer. From all appearances, Hewitt and the Everett Land Company seem to have been innocent purchasers, except that they could not take title save through Kromer's will, and therefore with knowledge of the whole record pertaining to the property. I advise a reversal, and therefore dissent.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Michigan
v.
Obed SILBERWOOD.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The fee of land under the waters of Lake Erie does not belong to riparian proprietors, but to the state subject to the right of navigation.
2. The dedication of a portion of the Great Lakes as a public hunting ground, made by Pub. Acts 1895, act No. 112, prohibiting the cutting or destruction of rushes or other submarine vegetation on the submerged lands, is valid.

(July 8, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Circuit Court for Monroe County made during the trial of a prosecution against him for cutting rushes in Lake Erie in front of private premises, which resulted in his conviction. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George M. Landon, for appellant:

Under this act the rushes must grow and spread turning the shore into marsh in which fishing with seins, drag nets, etc., the only way in which the shore owner has an exclusive right or privilege, must become a "lost art."

If this right could be considered a privilege or license it is a fair question whether it is revocable; for it would be a license granted to an owner of lands to facilitate the use of those lands in a particular manner and for an indefinite period.

Morrill v. Mackman, 24 Mich. 279.

But it is not a privilege and a license.

Lincoln v. Davis, 53 Mich. 375, 51 Am. Rep. 116; Grand Rapids v. Powers, 89 Mich. 115, 14 L. R. A. 498.

Mr. Sterling has valuable rights of property in the water and the lands thereunder in front of his lands. As riparian owner he is entitled to any and every use he can make of the land under the water and next to his "surveyed lands" not inconsistent with the public right of navigation.

Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 77 Am. Dec. 435; Rice v. Ruddiman, 10 Mich. 125.

The grant of a fractional section does not stop with the meandered line but carries with it a sand bar or place of shallow water in front of the premises.

When the title of the riparian owners extends usque ad filum aquæ, such proprietors are at liberty as against the public to erect any structure or do any act with respect to the water or the portion of the river bed owned by each provided they do not interfere with navigation, and the public have no other right than that of free and unmolested passage.

From this modification of the common-law rule of navigable waters there necessarily followed a modification of the common-law rule of riparian rights.

Ibid.

The rule here may be summarized as follows: (1) The fee of the soil under the Great Lakes is in the several states; (2) the fee of the soil under inland lakes and rivers is in the state when such waters have been held navigable by the reason of the common law applied to our changed conditions, and in the riparian owner when such waters have been held to be navigable by reason of legislation; (3) the right of fishing is public in the Great Lakes and in general in such waters where the state owns the fee thereunder, and private in rivers and waters where the fee is in the riparian owner.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to test the validity of Act No. 112, Pub. Acts 1895, which was intended to set aside certain submerged lands in Lake Erie and Detroit river, lying east of and adjacent to the surveyed lands in Monroe and Wayne counties, for a distance extending 1 mile into Lake Erie, for public shooting grounds, to make it unlawful to cut and destroy the rushes and other submarine vegetation on such submerged lands, and to provide a penalty therefor, which act provided that such reservation or dedication should not interfere with or detract from any right or privilege of any person or the public to fishing, and that such water should be free for purposes of navigation, provided, also, that said lands were owned by the state. Defendant was arrested in September, 1895, for cutting rushes on submerged lands adjacent to the property of the Monroe Marsh Company. He admitted these rushes were cut, not for the purposes of navigation, or of fishing, or in the enjoyment of fishing privileges. Defendant was working by direction of one Sterling, trustee of the marsh company.

The case of the people is based upon the following contentions: That the state is the owner of the fee of the land beneath the waters of the Great Lakes; that the vested right of the riparian owner on the Great Lakes is that of ingress and egress, by navigation, to and from his premises, with the rights of wharfage, etc.; that a dedication of a portion of the Great Lakes as a public hunting ground (subject, always, to the rights of navigation) is a valid dedication. The defendant contends that Mr. Sterling, as trustee of the marsh company, has valuable rights of property in the water, and the lands thereunder, in front of his lands; that, as riparian owner, he is entitled to any and every use he can make of the land under the water, and next to his surveyed lands, not inconsistent with the public right of navigation; that the right of fishing is a right of property, and not of privilege, and that this right of property cannot be summarily taken from him; that he had the right to cut the rushes to protect his shore or his fishing interest, or to prevent the flight of wild ducks being diverted from his marsh lands; or for any reason satisfactory to himself in the lawful enjoyment of his property; that the state owned none of these surveyed lands, and that the marsh company is the owner of the portion of the land under the water to the center of Lake Erie; that the act in question, arbitrarily, without notice or compensation, seeks to deprive him of the enjoyment of his property rights, and is therefore unconstitutional and void. The case comes here on error.

The defendant insists that the owners of land lying adjacent to Lake Erie in the county of Monroe, as such riparian proprietors, own the land to the center of that Great Lake, subject to the rights of navigation. If he is right in this contention, he was improperly convicted; otherwise, his conviction should stand. In support of his view of the law he cites a great many Michigan cases, and especially Richardson v. Prentiss, 48 Mich. 88; Harrington v. Port Huron, 86 Mich. 46, 13 L. R. A. 664; Blodgett & D. Lumber Co. v. Peters, 87 Mich. 498. At the common law, all tide waters were navigable, and nontidal waters were non navigable. The right to fish in navigable waters was public, but in non navigable waters it was private; the right depending, not upon the ownership of the shore, but upon the ownership of the soil under the water. Lincoln v. Davis, 53 Mich. 375, 51 Am. Rep. 116. The English common law made the ebb and flow of the tide the legal test of its navigability, for it was in fact the practical test. The conditions in this country, however, are very different. We have hundreds of miles of great rivers, and vast inland seas, wholly uninfluenced by the tides, upon which float vast fleets of vessels; so that the common-law doctrine in relation to tide waters is not accepted in this country, because not applicable to our circumstances. One of the earliest decisions in this state in which the principles involved in this case are discussed is La Plaisance Bay Harbor Co. v. Monroe, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 155. In that case the court held: "The bed of the stream is public property, and belongs to the state. This is the case with all meandered streams, no part of them being included in the original survey; and the common-law doctrine of usque ad filum aquæ is not applicable to them. The public owns the bed of this class of rivers, and is not limited in its right to an easement, or right of way only. So, with regard to our large lakes, or such parts of them as lie within the limits of the state. The proprietor of the adjacent shore has no property whatever in the land covered by the water of the lake." It is claimed by counsel for respondent that this decision had been overruled by later decisions of this court. It is conceded that, so far as the decision relates to the rights of shore owners on rivers and inland lakes, it is not now the law in Michigan (Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 77 Am. Dec. 435; Clute v. Fisher, 65 Mich. 48; Butler v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 85 Mich. 246); but it is insisted that it is still the law so far as the Great Lakes are concerned. An examination of all the cases decided by this court which have been called to our attention fails to disclose that the question of the title to the bed of the Great Lakes was directly at issue in any of them. There is language used in some of the cases that would tend to support the claim of the respondent that the shore owner upon the Great Lakes had the same right to the land (subject to the right of fishing and navigation) which is possessed by the shore owner on rivers. Lincoln v. Davis, and Blodgett & D. Lumber Co. v. Peters, supra. On the other hand, there are expressions used in other cases tending to show that, so far as the Great Lakes are concerned, the law is as stated in the La Plaisance Case. Sterling v. Jackson, 69 Mich. 488. Other states having like interests to our own state in the waters of these great inland seas have had the precise question involved here before them, and have passed upon it. In Diedrich v. Northwestern U. R. Co. 42 Wis. 248, 24 Am. Rep. 399, it was held that the vested right of the riparian owner on the Great Lakes is that of navigation to and from his premises, with the right of wharfage. The decisions in New York (Champlain & St. L. R. Co. v. Valentine, 19 Barb. 484), in Pennsylvania (Fulmer v. Williams, 122 Pa. 191, 1 L. R. A. 603), and in Ohio (Sloan v. Biemiller, 34 Ohio St. 492), all hold that the fee of the riparian owner ceases at the low-water mark.

In the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018, Judge Field, in delivering a very learned and exhaustive opinion, stated the law to be: "It is the settled law of this country that the ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by tide waters within the limits of the several states, belong to the respective states within which they are found, with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof, when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in the waters, and subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control their navigation so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the states. . . . The same doctrine is in this country held to be applicable to lands covered by fresh water in the Great Lakes, over which is conducted an extended commerce with different states and foreign nations. These lakes possess all the general characteristics of open seas, except in the freshness of their waters, and in the absence of the ebb and flow of the tide. In other respects they are inland seas, and there is no reason or principle for the assertion of dominion and sovereignty over and ownership by the state of lands covered by tide waters that is not equally applicable to its ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by the fresh waters of these lakes. . . . The Great Lakes are not in any appreciable respect affected by the tides, and yet on their waters . . . a large commerce is carried on, exceeding in many instances the entire commerce of states on the borders of the sea. When the reason of the limitation of admiralty jurisdiction in England was found inapplicable to the condition of navigable waters in this country, the limitation and all its incidents were discarded. So, also, by the common law, the doctrine of the dominion over and ownership by the Crown of lands within the realms under tide waters is not founded upon the existence of the tide over the lands, but upon the fact that the waters are navigable, "tide waters" and "navigable waters" . . . being used as synonymous terms in England. The public being interested in the use of such waters, the possession by private individuals of lands under them could not be permitted except by license of the Crown, which could alone exercise such dominion over the waters as would insure freedom in their use, so far as consistent with the public interest. The doctrine is founded upon the necessity of preserving to the public the use of navigable waters from private interruption and encroachment,—a reason as applicable to navigable fresh waters as to waters moved by the tide. We hold, therefore, that the same doctrine as to the dominion and sovereignty over and ownership of lands under the navigable waters of the Great Lakes applies, which obtains at the common law as to the dominion and sovereignty over and ownership of lands under tide waters on the borders of the sea, and that the lands are held by the same right in the one case as in the other, and subject to the same trusts and limitations." It seems to me the reasoning of this case is without flaw, and that the law enunciated therein ought to stand as the law of this state. It commends itself to one's reason and judgment, and avoids many difficulties incident to a different construction of the law. It is in harmony with the doctrine laid down in the early Case of La Plaisance, which I do not think has ever been overruled in this state so far as it affects the rights of shore owners on the borders of the Great Lakes. This doctrine, too, is in harmony with the decisions in all of the states bordering on these great seas. It logically follows that, if this view is to be regarded as the law, the legislature possessed authority to pass Act No. 112 of the Public Acts of 1895.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Montana, ex rel. C. J. MILSTED, Respt.,
v.
BUTTE CITY WATER COMPANY, Appt.

1. An answer that defendant has no knowledge or information upon which to form a belief as to a certain allegation, and therefore denies the same, is not such a specific denial as is required by Comp. Stat. 1887 (Code Civ. Proc. § 89).
2. The refusal of a water company to supply water to a tenant in the possession and occupancy of a house, when he is ready to pay for it in advance and the company is supplying a city and its inhabitants under a franchise, cannot be justified by a by-law declining to contract for water with any persons except owners of property or their authorized agents.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Silver Bow County in favor of relator in a mandamus proceeding to compel defendant to furnish relator with water. Affirmed.

Statement by Hunt, J.:

Mandamus to compel the respondent, defendant, to turn on the water for general use at a certain house in Butte. The petitioner avers that he is a citizen and inhabitant of Butte; that the defendant water company is a corporation existing under the laws of Montana, engaged in supplying the inhabitants of Butte with water, under a certain franchise granted to the predecessor in interest of said corporation by the city of Butte; that by the terms of said franchise the corporation is granted the right to lay its mains in the streets and alleys of Butte, and is required to supply the inhabitants of Butte with water for general use, at specified prices; that the defendant corporation is in full use and enjoyment of the franchise; that one Murray is the owner of the premises involved; that on June 12, 1894, the said Murray gave to relator a written order to the defendant company, requesting it to turn on the water at the premises, and to charge the same to the relator; that the relator is the tenant in possession of said premises; that, on presenting said order, relator tendered to the water company $4.50, the amount allowed by the said franchise as water rents for the said premises for three months in advance, and demanded that the company turn the water on at said premises; that the premises are supplied with water pipes connected with the mains, and in proper condition to use water supplied by the said company; that the mains are supplied with water, but that the said premises are without water, because the company refused to accept the tender, or turn the water on at said premises; that there are no other means by which relator can secure water for said premises, unless his petition for a writ of mandamus is granted. The respondent company answered, admitting that it is a corporation engaged in supplying the city of Butte and the inhabitants thereof with water, under a franchise, as set forth in relator's petition. The answer admits the ownership of Murray, but pleads "that, as whether your relator is now a tenant in possession of the said premises, respondent has no knowledge or information upon which to found a belief, and therefore denies the same." It admits the presentation of the order and the demand for water, but alleges that it refused to turn on the water by virtue of its rules and regulations, by which it can deal only with the owners of property requiring water to be turned on, or the agents of such owners. The rule invoked by respondent is as follows: "The water company contracts with owners of property, or their authorized agents only, and the property is invariably held for water rent. When water is turned off for any cause, it will not be turned on again until all back rent due on that building is paid in full. Money paid by tenants will be credited to the owner, but in so doing the company does not in any way release the owner from liability under this rule." Respondent further pleads that, when the premises involved were connected with the mains, the owner, Murray, signed an application, requesting a supply of water for the property, subject to the rules and regulations of the respondent company, and that, when the said application was filed, the rule heretofore set forth was in force, and the said Murray knew it was in force. Respondent says that, when the relator made his demand that the water be turned on for said premises, he was notified that the company would deal only with the owner, or his agent, and would not contract with the tenants to supply water to rented premises, except on the personal responsibility of the owner, and informed relator of the contents of the rule hereinbefore set forth. That the owner, Murray, at the time of relator's request that the water be turned on, refused to become personally responsible, or to allow his property to become responsible, for the payment of water rent; but that the respondent informed the relator that the money he tendered would be accepted, and the water turned on, but that the money so paid would be credited to the account of Murray, the owner of said premises. It is alleged then that the rule, as set forth, is reasonable and just, and without it the company cannot safely conduct its business; that, by virtue of its franchise, it supplies many of the inhabitants of Butte with water by meter measurement, and that, until the determination of the period for which a contract is made, and at which time the meters are read, it cannot determine what has been used, or to what amount the consumer is indebted to the company; that much property in Butte is occupied by tenants, and that, if respondent is obliged to deal with tenants, and look to them for pay of water, it would be subject to great loss and hardship; that it cannot, for reasons given, collect from the consumer in advance, and therefore is obliged to hold owners desiring water personally responsible.

Upon these pleadings the relator moved the court to make the alternative writ peremptory, notwithstanding the respondent's answer, for the reason that the matters set forth in said answer do not constitute a defense to relator's cause of action, or set forth any reason why said writ such not be made peremptory. The court granted this motion, and made the writ peremptory. The respondent appeals from the order sustaining the relator's motion to make the alternative writ peremptory.

Messrs. Corbett & Welcome for appellant.

Messrs. George Heldorn and Oliver M. Hall, for respondent:

A water company acting under a franchise permitting it to use the streets and alleys of a city for the purpose of laying its mains to supply the city and its inhabitants with water may be compelled to do so by mandamus.

Haugen v. Albina Light & W. Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L. R. A. 424; Portland Nat. Gas & O. Co. v. State, Keen, 135 Ind. 54, 21 L. R. A. 639; People, Kennedy, v. Manhattan Gaslight Co. 45 Barb. 137; Shepard v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 6 Wis. 539, 70 Am. Dec. 479.

The owner of the property is under no legal obligation to the occupant of the premises to become responsible for his water supply, but the water company by the very terms of its franchise is bound to supply with water every inhabitant of the city who offers to pay therefor the amount prescribed by the franchise.

The fact that the company may be required to furnish water by meter measurement does not prove that the rule in question is either reasonable or necessary.

Williams v. Mutual Gas Co. 52 Mich. 499, 50 Am. Rep. 266.

Under the provisions of the franchise in the case at bar the requirement is not to furnish water to or for real estate but to the inhabitants of the city of Butte. A gas company cannot refuse to furnish gas to a person because he refuses to pay a former bill or a bill contracted on different premises.

Gaslight Co. v. Colliday, 25 Md. 1; Lloyd v. Washington Gaslight Co. 1 Mackey, 331.

Nor can it shut off the gas on the ground that there are arrears due from a former occupant of the premises.

Morey v. Metropolitan Gaslight Co. 6 Jones & S. 185.

A denial based on a want of information or belief has invariably been held to raise no issue.

Claflin v. Reese, 54 Iowa, 544; Manny v. French, 23 Iowa, 250; Elton v. Markham, 20 Barb. 343; Lloyd v. Burns, 62 N. Y. 651; Greer v. Covington, 83 Ky. 410; Hastings v. Gwynn, 12 Wis. 672; Mead v. Day, 54 Miss. 58; Heye v. Bolles, 33 How. Pr. 266; Sayre v. Cushing, 7 Abb. Pr. 371; Terrill v. Jennings, 1 Met. (Ky.) 450; Curtis v. Richards, 9 Cal. 34.

The rule in itself is not a reasonable one and the assent to it by Murray was without a valuable consideration, and would not be binding as a contract even on him.

A promise to pay a person for doing what he is already bound to do is without consideration.

Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 392; Withers v. Ewing, 40 Ohio St. 400; Bartlett v. Wyman, 14 Johns. 260; McCann v. Lewis, 9 Cal. 246; Hale v. Forbis, 3 Mont. 395; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 834, and cases cited in note 4.

A gas company cannot refuse gas to a person on the sole ground that he refused to sign an agreement to accept gas subject to certain rules that were held to be unreasonable.

Shepard v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 6 Wis. 539, 70 Am. Dec. 479; Shepard v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 15 Wis. 318, 82 Am. Dec. 679.

Hunt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant contends that there was an issue of fact tendered by the answer of respondent upon the question whether relator was or was not a tenant in possession of the premises involved. But we think that the denial of respondent that "as to whether relator is a tenant in possession of the said premises, it had no knowledge or information upon which to found a belief, and therefore denies the same," was not good under Comp. Stat. 1887 (Code Civ. Proc. § 89). The Code required a specific denial of the material allegations of the complaint controverted by the defendant. "If the complaint be verified, the denial of each allegation controverted must be specific, and be made positively, or according to the information and belief of the defendant." While there are cases and authors holding a denial such as respondent's good under codes quite similar to the Montana Code of 1887, in California this exact question was long since decided by Justice Field, for the supreme court of that state, in Curtis v. Richards, 9 Cal. 34, where it was said of a denial like appellant's: "There are but two forms in which a defendant can controvert the allegations of a verified complaint, so as to raise an issue: first, positively, when the facts are within his own personal knowledge; and, second, upon information and belief, when the facts are not within his own personal knowledge. Practice Act, § 46. These forms cannot be indiscriminately used. It the facts alleged in the complaint are presumptively within the knowledge of the defendant, he must answer positively; and a denial upon information and belief will be treated as an invasion. Thus, for example, in reference to instruments of writing alleged in a complaint to have been executed by the defendant, a positive answer will alone satisfy the requirements of the statute. If the defendant has forgotten the execution of the instruments, or doubts the correctness of their description or copy in the complaint, he should, before answering, take the requisite steps to obtain an inspection of the originals. Practice Act, § 446. If the facts alleged in the complaint are not personally within the knowledge of the defendant, he must answer according to his information and belief. In no case can an allegation of the complaint be controverted by a denial of sufficient knowledge or information upon the subject to form a belief. By the 46th section of the practice act, as originally passed in 1851, it was provided that an allegation of the complaint might be controverted by a denial 'of any knowledge thereof sufficient to form a belief.' In practice, this mode of denial was found to furnish a convenient pretext for evading the statute. In some instances, defendants became critical in their judgments, as to the extent of knowledge sufficient to form a belief, and would, without hesitation, deny, in that form, facts upon the existence of which they did not hesitate to act in other matters. In 1854, the 46th section was amended to the present language, and the wisdom of the amendment is well illustrated by the present case." See also San Francisco Gas Co. v. San Francisco, 9 Cal. 467, where, on rehearing, the court adhere to the rule established in Curtis v. Richards.

The Montana practice act, as it appears in the Laws of 1887, having been principally taken from California, and having been modified in its requirements of what a denial must contain, and how it must be made, after the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Maclay v. Sands, 94 U. S. 586, 24 L. ed. 211, Reversing Sands v. Maclay, 2 Mont. 35, the construction of the California Code should have great weight in the construction of similar provisions of our practice act. Bliss, Code Pl. § 326, says: "The pleader is not permitted to evade the statute. He must deny directly and positively, or must deny in the language of the statute, 'according to his information and belief.' To say that 'he has not sufficient knowledge to form a belief,' and therefore denies, will not do; nor will it be permitted to 'deny for want of information to enable them to admit.'" Pom. Code Rem. § 640; Estee, Pl. & Pr. § 3224.

The supreme court of South Dakota, in Cumins v. Lawrence County, 1 S. D. 158, held that a denial, such as appellant has made in the case at bar, is not a denial of any fact averred, "but is a mere denial of any knowledge or information as to the alleged facts sufficient to form a belief in respect to their existence or nonexistence," and, of itself, is no defense. By statute of that state, however, such a denial is expressly authorized, and, by virtue of the statutory permission, that form of denial is held good. Maxwell, Code Pl. p. 386, holds such denials good, but he does not refer to the California cases, and relies upon the single case of State, Treadwell, v. Hancock County Comrs. 11 Ohio St. 183, to sustain his text. But it is evident, from an inspection of the Ohio case, that the statute in force was different from that of California and Montana.

It is observed that the new Codes of 1895 extend the method and form of denials, giving far more latitude, apparently, than under the former practice. Code Civ. Proc. 1895, § 690. We shall follow the California cases, and hold that the statutory form of denial was the only one to be sustained. The denial, therefore, being insufficient, and no issues of fact being presented, the question for determination is: Can the appellant water company refuse to supply relator with water for general purposes at the premises involved? The appellant is a water company, engaged in supplying the inhabitants of the city of Butte with water, under its franchise. The city gave the corporation the right to lay its mains in its streets and alleys. The company, on the other hand, is required to supply the inhabitants of the city of Butte with water for general use, at prices specified in the franchise granted. The relator is an inhabitant of Butte, occupying premises wholly without water for general use, and there are no other means by which water for his house may be secured, except from the appellant corporation. Ought the appellant to be allowed to refuse his tender for water in advance, and to refuse him water upon the ground that, "by virtue of its rules and regulations adopted, it can deal only with the owners of the property requiring water to be turned on, or the agents of said owners?" We say not. The performance of the duty the company undertook when it accepted the franchise granted was to supply the inhabitants of the city with water. "A waterworks company is also a quasi-public corporation. It must supply water to all who apply therefor and offer to pay the rates." Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law, § 932. The account of which the grant was given was a public purpose. Lumbard v. Stearns, 4 Cush. 61. Therefore, "the grant is subject to an implied condition that the company shall assume an obligation to fulfil the public purpose on account of which the grant was made." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1129.

The view that supplying a city and its inhabitants with water for general purposes is a business of a public nature, and meets a general necessity, is sustained by the great weight of authority, reviewed in a learned opinion of Lord, Ch. J., in Haugen v. Albina Light & W. Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L. R. A. 424. It was there said: "The defendant by incorporating, under the statute for the purpose of supplying water to the city and its inhabitants, undertook a business which it could not have carried on without the grant of eminent domain over the streets in which to lay its pipes. It was by incorporating for this purpose, and in accepting the grant, it became invested with a franchise, belonging to the public and not enjoyed of common right, for the accomplishment of public objects and the promotion of public convenience and comfort. Its business was not of a private, but of a public nature, and designed, under the conditions of the grant, as well for the benefit of the public as the company." Certainly, the company may make reasonable rules and regulations. Doubtless it may require payments in advance for a reasonable length of time. It may, within certain reasonable limitations, cut off the supply of those who refuse to pay water rents due. It may make regulations authorizing an examination of meters in houses at reasonable times, or adopt other reasonable rules for the regulation of its affairs. But it has no power to abridge the obligations, as assumed by it in accepting its franchise, to supply an inhabitant of Butte with water, if he pays them for it in advance, and is a tenant in the possession and occupancy of a house, in need of water for general purposes. Whether the owner has made a contract with the corporation to hold himself personally liable or not, or whether he has signed any paper agreeing to subject his property to a lien for water rents, we will not discuss in this case. The water company in no case, however, can go beyond the powers granted to it, and such powers must be exercised in a reasonable manner; and if it has adopted a by-law that is in conflict with their franchise, which may be termed its constitution, or is unreasonable or oppressive, the subordinate rule or by-law will be set aside. Thomp. Corp. §§ 1010 et seq. This relator was entitled to water, and to a receipt for his payment issued directly to him, and to have the amount of his payment credited to him alone, and the by-law pleaded by the company is, as to him, clearly unreasonable; and it is immaterial to his rights whether the owner had any agreement with the company or not, or whether, as tenant, he knew of the existence of any such agreement. The duty of the company under its franchise, and undertaken to be fulfilled, must be performed.

Edward NUGENT, Admr., etc., of Christian Otto, Deceased.

* 1. In an action for personal injury, the plaintiff, in order to recover damages, must do more than show the possible responsibility of the defendant for the injury. In the absence of direct evidence, he must show the existence of such circumstances as would justify the inference that the injury was caused by the wrongful act of the defendant, and exclude the idea that it was due to a cause with which the defendant was unconnected.

dead body was found lying upon the corner of Washington avenue and Pearl street, about 3 feet from the base of one of the electric light poles of the plaintiff in error, which was standing there. This suit was thereupon brought by the defendant in error against the Electric Light Company to recover from it the pecuniary loss sustained by the widow and children of the intestate by reason of his death; the plaintiff's claim being that decedent's death was caused by an electric shock, received from an exposed wire upon the said electric light pole, and due to the improper construction and maintenance of the defendant company's electric light plant at that point.

On the trial, at the close of the plaintiff's case, there was a motion to nonsuit, which was refused by the trial court, and, upon this refusal, error is assigned. The grounds upon which, it is claimed, the motion to nonsuit shou'd have prevailed, are: First, that the evidence failed to show anything more than that the defendant was possibly responsible for the death of Otto; and, second, that, if it be considered that the evidence warrants the conclusion that his death was attributable to the defendant, the facts also demonstrate that he contributed by his own negligence to the accident which caused his death. It must be conceded that the plaintiff below was bound to show something more than that the defendant was possibly responsible for the decedent's death, in order to entitle him to a verdict. It was incumbent upon him, in the absence of direct evidence of that fact, to show not only the existence of such possible responsibility, but the existence of such circumstances as would justify the inference that the death was caused by the wrongful act of the defendant, and would exclude the idea that it was due to a cause with which the defendant was unconnected. Bond v. Smith, 113 N. Y. 378; Houston v. Traphagen, 47 N. J. L. 23. And this, it seems to me, he has done. No one was present when the decedent came to his death, and therefore there was no direct evidence to show how it was caused; but it appeared, from the plaintiff's proofs, that there was fastened upon the pole, at the foot of which decedent's body was found, a reel, around which was wound a wire rope used for the purpose of raising and lowering one of the defendant's arc lamps; that the reel was about on a level with the top of a man's head; and that the wire rope around it was practically uninsulated, and was heavily charged with electricity. It also appeared that the post mortem examination of decedent showed all his organs to have been in a normal condition; that his death was not caused by disease of any kind; that there was upon his left hand, and running all the way across it, a freshly made burn, about one sixth of an inch in width; and that the blood was in an abnormal state, its condition being such as is found in the bodies of persons who have died from electric shock. These facts, unexplained, not only make it reasonable to suppose that the decedent came to his death through having touched with his hand the uninsulated wire upon the reel which was fastened to the defendant's electric light pole, and thereby received a fatal shock, but exclude any other inference. For such a death, the defendant was plainly responsible. It was using, in the public streets of Elizabeth, an agency dangerous to human life; and it was bound to take every reasonable precaution to protect the public, while using those streets, against injury from that agency. The maintaining upon a reel, which was fastened to an electric light pole so near to the ground as to be within easy reach, of an uninsulated wire heavily charged with electricity, was, in my judgment, a gross neglect of the duty which it owed to the public. The first ground upon which the refusal to nonsuit is attacked is without force, and cannot prevail.

Nor is the objection that the decedent's own carelessness contributed to the injury which caused his death more tenable. There was nothing in the plaintiff's case to show under what circumstances he received the shock which killed him, and nothing, therefore, upon which his negligence could be predicated. It did not appear that he had knowledge that the wire was not properly insulated, or that it was charged with electricity, and he, as well as every other member of the public, was justified in presuming that this company had so constructed its electric light line, and was so maintaining it, that it would not be a source of danger to persons using the street. Durant v. Palmer, 29 N. J. L. 544; Houston v. Traphagen, supra. Whether the decedent was guilty of negligence in coming into contact with this live wire depended entirely upon the circumstances under which it was done. Such negligence cannot be presumed from the mere fact of his having done so, and, as there was nothing else in the plaintiff's case to indicate carelessness on the part of his intestate, the motion for nonsuit was without support on this ground also.

The judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Mr. Henry A. Fluck for respondents.

Gummere, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant in this case filed his bill for the partition of certain lands in the county of Hunterdon, which were conveyed on May 9, 1834, to his parents, Asher and Jane Fulper, "as tenants in common." Both grantees are now dead, Asher Fulper having survived his wife, who died intestate. The husband, however, left a will, by which he devised the whole of his real estate to five of his children, disinheriting the remaining one, the complainant, who, the will declared, "shall take nothing under this will." The complainant bases his right to a partition of the lands in question upon the fact that he is one of the heirs at law of his mother, and, as such, the owner of an undivided interest therein. His ownership is challenged by his brothers and sisters, the ground of their contention being that, notwithstanding the fact that the lands were conveyed to their parents as tenants in common, they, by force of law, held them as tenants of the entirety, and that, therefore, upon the death of their mother, the whole estate became vested in their father, by right of survivorship, as tenant in fee simple.

The learned advisory master who heard the case adopted the view advanced by the defendants, and held that the complainant had no interest in the lands which he sought to have partitioned, following the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 397, which holds that, in consequence of the theoretic unity, and entirety of the ownership of the husband and wife with respect to their interest in lands, they cannot hold by moieties, and that, where land is conveyed to them in common, they take an entirety of estate, without regard to the intent appearing in the conveyance. The decision in Stuckey v. Keefe rests upon the ground that there are certain incidents to a tenancy in common which cannot exist in an estate held by husband and wife. Those incidents are said to be that tenants in common may sell their respective shares; that they are compellable to make partition; that they are liable to reciprocal actions of waste and account; that, if one turns the other out of possession, an action of ejectment will lie. And it is said that, where lands are held by a husband and wife jointly, he cannot sell his moiety free from her dower, nor can she sell hers at all without his consent, and that no action of partition or account or waste or ejectment can be maintained by one against the other. The fact that a husband cannot sell his moiety of lands held jointly with his wife, free from her dower, and that she cannot sell hers at all without his consent, does not seem to afford a substantial reason for concluding that they cannot therefore hold lands as tenants in common. The same fact is equally true of lands held by either the husband or wife in severalty, and yet it has never been suggested that this fact would operate to prevent lands from being so held by a married person.

Nor does it seem to me that the fact of the inability of the husband or wife to maintain an action of partition or of waste or of ejectment or of account against the other (admitting that such inability exists) justifies the conclusion that they cannot hold as tenants in common. The reason why, at common law, an action could not be maintained by the wife against the husband for an accounting of the rents and profits of an estate held by him and her, or for the joint possession thereof, was not because of anything characteristic of the estate so held, but because the husband, by the jus mariti, was entitled to the exclusive possession of his wife's land during her life, and to the rents and profits thereof, whether held by her jointly with him or in severalty. Hiles v. Fisher, 144 N. Y. 306, 30 L. R. A. 305. So far as the husband is concerned, while it is true that he could not maintain an action at law against his wife for an accounting of the rents and profits of their joint estate, or for the joint possession thereof, or for waste committed, I see no reason why he could not have proceeded against her by a bill in equity, which has always been resorted to for the enforcement of rights and the redress of wrongs as between husband and wife. So, too, it seems to me that a court of equity would, at the instance of the wife, restrain waste of the joint estate by the husband, whether they held as tenants of the entirety or as tenants in common. Nor can I concede that an action of partition of the joint estate cannot be maintained by the husband against the wife, or vice versa, unless, of course, there is a survivorship. Equity will decree a partition between husband and wife, if they hold as tenants in common, to the same extent which it would if they were strangers. It is reasoning in a circle to say that a partition of land cannot be made between husband and wife because their estate is by entireties, and that the proof that their estate is by entireties is the fact that there can be no partition between them.

It is a mistake to suppose that there is anything in the theoretic unity of husband and wife which prevents them from being able to hold moieties of the same estate. It has always been held that if a man and woman become possessed of an estate as joint tenants or as tenants in common, and afterwards marry, they still retain their moieties after marriage, and continue to hold as joint tenants or tenants in common. Co. Litt. 187*b*; 1 Preston Estates, 434; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 425, and cases cited. There being nothing in the marriage relation which prevents those who were tenants in common before marriage from remaining such after marriage, it would seem to follow, necessarily, that there is nothing in that relationship which would prevent a husband and wife from taking such an estate after marriage, provided it clearly appeared from the deed or devise under which they took that such was the intention. This was the view taken by Chancellor Green in McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 78. In that case a bill was filed for a partition of land, brought by a grantee of a husband against the wife. The bill alleged that the husband and wife were seised in fee of the land, as tenants in common, by virtue of a conveyance made to them, and that the husband had conveyed to the complainant all his interest therein. There was a demurrer filed to the bill on behalf of the wife, upon the ground, among others, that, by the conveyance to them, she and her husband took an estate by entireties. Discussing this point, the chancellor says: "The bill alleges that the husband and wife were seised as tenants in common by virtue of a conveyance made to them. Even, therefore, if it appears by the bill that the conveyance was made during coverture, that fact is not absolutely inconsistent with the creation of a tenancy in common. As there is a direct averment that the conveyance created a tenancy in common, it must be assumed that apt words were used in the deed for that purpose." In the case of Buttlar v. Rosenblath, 42 N. J. Eq. 651, 59 Am. Rep. 52, which involved the effect of our married woman's act upon estates by entireties, Mr. Justice Van Syckel states that a tenancy in common between husband and wife may be created by deed, provided there be, in the conveyance, an expression of an intention to do so. The same view has been taken by the courts of other states as well as by the United States Supreme Court. In the case of Miner v. Brown, 133 N. Y. 308, it is said that whether a husband and wife take as tenants in common, or as tenants of the entirety, is to be gathered from the instrument which passes the estate to them, and, that where it appears from the instrument that it was the intention that they should take as tenants in common, that intention must prevail; and it is said that such has been the rule from an early period in the history of the English law. In Knapp v. Windsor, 6 Cush. 157, and Brown v. Baraboo, 90 Wis. 151, 30 L. R. A. 320, it is held that where lands descend to a husband and wife, as heirs at law, they take and hold as tenants in common, and not as tenants by entireties. In the case of Hunt v. Blackburn, 128 U. S. 464, 32 L. ed. 488, it is declared that, at common law, where lands are granted to husband and wife as tenants in common, they will hold by moieties, as other distinct and individual persons would do. It seems clear, both on principle and authority, that the rule laid down in McDermott v. French, that a husband and wife may be made tenants in common by express words contained in the grant, is the correct one, but, even if it was otherwise, we ought to adhere to the rule as stated in the opinion in that case. Since its promulgation in 1862, it has been accepted by the bar of this state as a correct enunciation of the law on this subject, and has become a rule of property, upon which many titles, undoubtedly, are founded. It should not now be altered unless by legislative enactment.

The decree of the Court of Chancery should be reversed.

Charles PICKSLAY, Respt.,
v.
Theodore B. STARR, Appt.

(149 N. Y. 432.)

A Christmas gift by a check to an employee according to habit of previous years, although it is made in forgetfulness of the fact that his salary had been increased during the year, and is charged to his account a few days later, but without giving him notice of that fact for several months, cannot be avoided by the donor on the ground of mistake.

(May 26, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment entered in the office of the clerk of Kings County upon the report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover salary alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

The action was brought to recover a balance alleged by the plaintiff to be due to him from the defendant, pursuant to an agreement between them relating to his compensation while in the latter's employment. For a number of years, prior to the year 1889, the defendant had been in the habit of giving to the plaintiff at Christmas a present of $2,500. In April, 1889, an arrangement was made between them, by which the plaintiff's salary was increased to $9,000, from and after May 1, 1889; and from and after May 1, 1890, in addition to to the sum of $9,000, plaintiff was to receive a commission for the year of 1½ per cent upon the amount of the defendant's sales in excess of $600,000. In the evening of December 24, 1889, at an interview between the plaintiff and the defendant, the latter handed to the former a check for $2,500, with an expression of his wishes for a merry Christmas. On the day after Christmas another interview occurred between the parties, after which the plaintiff was departing for his home, but, remembering that he had not spoken to the defendant about the present, he returned, saw the defendant and said to him: "I came back to thank you for your present to me, and also, on behalf of

NOTE.—As to the gift of checks, see note to Re Taylor's Estate (Pa.) 18 L. R. A. 855.

Mrs. Pickslay to return her thanks to you for the present you gave her." The defendant replied that he "was very glad they were pleased." A few days later the defendant's attention was called to the check by his bookkeeper, and, being asked what should be done with it he directed him to charge it to the plaintiff's account. The defendant did not, however, then speak to the plaintiff upon the subject, nor was the plaintiff informed with respect to the entry in the books until the May following, when it appeared in an account rendered to him by the bookkeeper. At that time the defendant was absent in Europe. In September of that year, and again in the winter or spring following, the plaintiff says he spoke to the defendant about the bookkeeper having charged the $2,500 against him, and that there was discussion between them, the plaintiff insisting that he had every reason to suppose it was a gift, and the defendant insisting that it was a mistake. In April, 1891, the plaintiff entered into business for himself. According to the defendant's evidence, the new arrangement, with respect to the compensation of the plaintiff, was made upon the basis of increasing his previous salary by adding to it the usual Christmas gift of $2,500 and a still further sum. He had forgotten about the new arrangement between them at the time when he made the Christmas gift in question, and in making it he had followed the habit of previous years. He testified that the whole thing was a mistake, and that he had not intended to give the $2,500 to the plaintiff in addition to his salary and commissions under the new arrangement. The finding of the referee before whom the trial was had is "that the sum of $2,500, paid by the defendant on or about the 24th day of December, 1889, to plaintiff, was not a payment on account of salary, but was a gift from defendant to plaintiff."

The dispute between the parties turns upon whether there was a valid gift of the $2,500 to the plaintiff, as he claims; or whether, the gift having been made under a mistake, as the defendant claims, it was invalid and could be now offset against the demand of the plaintiff for the balance due to him in account, at the time when he left the defendant's employment, in April, 1891. The judgment entered upon the direction of the referee in the plaintiff's favor, for the amount as claimed by him, has been affirmed by the general term, and the defendant has appealed to this court from the judgment of affirmance.

Mr. Delos McCurdy, with Messrs. Vanderpoel, Cuming, & Goodwin, for appellant:

A gift will not be presumed. Neither will an intention to make a gift be presumed. All the facts necessary to prove such intention, and all the facts necessary to prove a gift made in pursuance of such intent, must be clearly established.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a peculiar case. It is perfectly clear that the defendant intended, at the time, to give to the plaintiff the Christmas present of $2,500, and it is also equally clear that subsequently he bethought himself of the new arrangement which he had made with respect to his clerk's compensation, and became conscious of the mistake he had committed. Of course, notwithstanding the new arrangement between them, which, according to the defendant, was upon a basis which would make the usual annual Christmas gift no longer a thing to be expected, there was nothing to prevent his continuing to recognize the peculiar value to him of the plaintiff's services by way of gifts of money. When, upon the occasion of their interview on Christmas eve, he handed the envelope containing the check to the plaintiff, with the expression of his good wishes, there can be no doubt that there were present the two elements necessary to constitute a perfect gift, viz., the intention to give, followed by a delivery of the thing given. The argument that the defendant could not have intended to give the $2,500, because that sum would then have been given twice, in view of its having been included by the defendant in the new arrangement with respect to compensation, is not quite sound. All that is necessary to constitute intention, and all that we understand, legally or otherwise, by intention, is the design or determination of the mind, and that mental condition may exist when an act is done irrespective of the fact that, were something else then recalled, it might not have acted in the same manner. This is not like the case where parties come to some agreement, in the belief that a certain state of facts exists, and money is paid by the one to the other in consequence thereof, and it subsequently appears that there was a mistake with regard to the facts. Money when so paid is deemed to have been received by the one to whom it is paid to the use of the one paying it. The mutual error, which affected the agreement between the parties, requires that they should be remitted to their original rights. In such a case, in equity and in justice, the money does not belong to the party receiving it. So, too, if there is an equitable basis for redress, by reason of some mistake of fact in the contract, due to the ignorance or forgetfulness of the party, equity will not infrequently intervene. The principle is, in such cases, that there is not that consent of the minds which is essential to the perfect agreement. A gift, however, requires no consideration and depends upon no agreement, but upon the voluntary act of the donor only, and is accomplished by a delivery of the subject of the gift.

The defendant's silence towards the plaintiff for months afterwards, until the latter, becoming acquainted with the fact of the bookkeeper having charged the sum to his account in the books, had the opportunity of speaking with him upon the subject, is a very remarkable fact and one which militates against the defendant's case in every way. The finding of the referee, that there was a gift from the defendant to the plaintiff, is not only supported by the affirmative evidence in the case given by the plaintiff, but it would have support in the inferences which might be drawn from the strange silence of the defendant towards the plaintiff subsequently. Indeed, it is difficult to see, giving all faith to the defendant's testimony about the matter, how the referee could have come to a different conclusion than he did upon the facts. If the defendant's position was tenable, that a gift under a mistake invalidates it and the giver is at any time justified in setting up the mistake in order to defeat the gift, it might, in instances, result in great injustice, if not hardship. The party receiving an important gift might be so misled by the silence of the other into believing, not only that the giver had meant to give, but that he had not repented him of his act, as, in that belief, to have spent the money, or to have changed his mode of life in consequence. How was the plaintiff to know, after the gift of this money to him accompanied with the friendly expressions of the giver, in the time that followed, that he had incurred an obligation to return the money? It would be a very harsh rule to lay down, that a party, receiving a gift under the circumstances of the present case might incur, to quote the language in Haviland v. Willets, 141 N. Y. at p. 52, "an unknown and unsuspected obligation, if required to return the fund."

In answer to the argument of the appellant, that the delivery of the donor's check did not make a valid gift of the sum of $2,500, it is sufficient to say that it is not like the making of a promise, such as would be the donor's promissory note, where the gift is not consummated until the delivery of the thing promised and remains revocable until such delivery. The delivery of a check is the delivery of something which represents a certain sum of money which the drawer of the check intends that the payee shall, in fact, have. What the defendant gave to the plaintiff, while in form his own check, in fact was an order upon the bank to pay to him the sum of money represented by it. That the transaction was complete, by the payment of the check to the plaintiff, is amply evidenced; if by nothing else, by the very direction of the defendant to his bookkeeper to charge its amount to the account of the plaintiff in his books. The reasoning of the referee with respect to this point made by the appellant is perfectly satisfactory.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed with costs.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

J. W. HUTCHINS
v.
Town of DURHAM.

(.....N. C.....)

1. The occupant of a stall in a market under a provision in town laws that his license may be revoked for any cause which the board may deem sufficient is a mere licensee, and not a lessee.
2. A tenancy from year to year is not created by holding over as occupant of a stall in a market under a license revocable at the pleasure and discretion of the licensor, after the time fixed for the annual renting of the stalls.
3. A person may be expelled as a trespasser from a stall in a market which he has held under a revocable license, when he refuses to vacate it after revocation of his license and notice to leave.

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Superior Court for Durham County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged unlawful ejection of plaintiff from a market stall which he had leased from defendant. The plaintiff appealed from so much of the decree as refused to award him punitive damages, and the defendant appealed from so much as permitted any recovery. Affirmed on plaintiff's appeal. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The town of Durham has an ordinance declaring that the clerk of the market under the supervision of the market committee shall annually rent out publicly the fish and meat stalls and vegetable benches in the market house for one year from the first of May ensuing. Plaintiff on or about the last week in April, 1887, rented stall No. 2 at the price of $13 per month. This was the last annual renting under the ordinance. He subsequently purchased an adjoining stall of another renter, and with the assent of the governing authorities of the town took possession of it. He continued to hold these stalls under the renting of 1887 until the town commissioners in July, 1894, directed the clerk of the market to advertise a new renting on the 1st day of August, 1894, for the remainder of the unexpired year. This proposed renting was advertised and held and the stalls rented to a third person, plaintiff refusing to bid on the ground that he already held a lease of the stalls, and at the time of the renting he tendered the rent for the ensuing month, which was refused. He was then notified to vacate the stalls, and upon his refusal to do so the police officers of the town removed his property from them and carried him bodily out of them when he protested against their action and refused to voluntarily leave.

The further facts appear in the opinion.

C. 237; Rose v. Baltimore, 51 Md. 256, 34 Am. Rep. 309; San Antonio v. Royal (Tex.) 16 S. W. 1101; Dubuque v. Miller, 11 Iowa, 583; Mosseller v. Deaver, 106 N. C. 494, 8 L. R. A. 537.

Messrs. F. A. Green and Fuller, Winston, & Fuller for defendant.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon offering the required testimony as to character and capacity, the plaintiff, at the regular time provided in the ordinances of the town for renting (during the last week in April, 1887), rented stall No. 2 in the defendant's market house, at a rental of $13 per month; and there being no further public rentings in pursuance of the ordinance until April, 1894, the plaintiff, though still retaining stall No. 2, added stall No. 3, by purchasing the business of one M. Oppenheimer, who had, at the first letting, leased and occupied it. Since the plaintiff took possession under the license, in 1887, there has been continuously a provision in the town laws that "such license [as that granted him] may be revoked" for any cause which the board may deem sufficient. Where parties contract in contemplation of a statute then in force, its provisions are deemed to constitute a part of the agreement, just as though they had been incorporated in it. Koonce v. Russell, 103 N. C. 181; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 285; McCless v. Meekins, 117 N. C. 34; Strickland v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 154 Pa. 348, 21 L. R. A. 224. A licensed occupant of a stall in a market house has no such interest in the soil as he acquires by virtue of a contract of lease for a store or dwelling house. He cannot recover possession of it by an action in the nature of ejectment if wrongfully evicted from it, but, as a mere licensee, can at most, maintain an action for damages. Strickland v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra. When the plaintiff entered, and while remaining as an occupant of the stall, the by-law made his license revocable at the discretion of the authorities of the town, for any reason they deemed sufficient. That he paid his money for a license held by any such precarious tenure was his own fault, if fault it was. He was under no compulsion to submit to any such terms if he felt averse to doing so. He and all other persons were presumed to know the law, and to conduct such business with an eye to its provisions. It is not material that the town had the power to repeal its ordinance, when it had never in fact annulled or altered it in the least particular. Where a legislative committee is authorized to enter into a contract for the public printing, the act empowering them to do so may either simply create them agents of the state to enter into an agreement, in which case they are left subject to any existing law relating to the manner of entering into such contract, or the law-making power may define their duties in the statute, constituting the agency, in such a way as, by implication or directly, to repeal pre-existing laws on the sub ject. This illustration is used because it is one familiar to those who have observed legislative proceedings. In the same way, succeeding boards of commissioners are deemed to act sub ject to the provisions of ordinances passed by their predecessors in authority, until they see fit to repeal them directly, or to substitute others inconsistent with the older enactments.

It was insisted for the plaintiff on the argument that, by holding over after the time fixed in the ordinance for an annual meeting, the plaintiff became a tenant from year to year. It is true that when land is leased for a year, and the tenant is suffered to hold over without any new contract, the law implies a promise on the part of the lessee to pay the same rent, and on the part of the lessor to agree to the same terms, and the tenancy becomes one from year to year. But no such implication can arise while a law stands upon the statute books of the town declaring in express terms that a meat stall is held under a license revocable at the pleasure and discretion of the licensor,—not under a lease,—if, from the nature of this police power, another relation could be created in its exercise in any case, except by express contract. Hatch v. Pendergast, 15 Md. 252. One who occupies a stall under a license granted in pursuance of the provisions of an ordinance defining the rights and duties of the town (such as that under which plaintiff entered) is not a lessee, but a mere licensee. He acquires no right in the soil, but is an occupant at the absolute pleasure and discretion of the licensor. Hughes v. Recorder's Court (Mich.) 27 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 631, note, 75 Mich. 574, 4 L. R. A. 863; Barry v. Kennedy, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 421; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 463; Hatch v. Pendergast, supra; Charleston v. Goldsmith, 2 Speers, L. 428; Strickland v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra; Rose v. Baltimore, 51 Md. 256, 34 Am. Rep. 308.

The fact that the town prescribes, in its ordinances, a day on which there shall be an annual renting of the stalls, confers no right on one who has voluntarily become an occupant of one of them upon the terms set forth in the ordinances. If he and all other occupants were subject to removal at discretion, the town could either advertise and offer all stalls in April, or evict all the tenants at any other time, and substitute others, by a public or private letting, in their places. On July 10, in pursuance of an order of July 3, 1894, a notice that the stalls would be offered publicly for rent on August 1, 1894, was posted at the market house, and seen by the plaintiff, who was present also when his own stall was rented, and was notified on August 9 to vacate on August 10, 1894. He paid no attention to the notice, and persisted in his refusal to remove his property or leave himself, when the policemen appeared upon the scene at the appointed hour on that day. He suffered them to remove a heavy safe, and to place his fresh beef, after removal, on marble slabs, without assistance, and without a request in relation to the matter, He then placed himself upon his block, which it was necessary to move, and thereby forced the policemen to lift the block up with him on top of it, and carry both out of the way. About the time they reached the place selected for depositing the block, the plaintiff fell off, and caught "upon his all fours." In no aspect of the evidence is this either an unlawful expulsion or a lawful expulsion conducted in a manner so unnecessarily violent as to entitle the expelled party to damages, either compensatory or vindictive. Where a guest in an hotel, a passenger on a railway train, or a ticket holder at a theater, creates a disturbance, though either has a right under his contract to remain so long as he acts with due regard to the rights of others, the proprietor, conductor, or manager, or their agents, may use the amount of force necessary to expel. State v. Steele, 106 N. C. 766, 8 L. R. A. 516. But markets are necessary to the life of the residents of a municipality, and for that reason it has been held that the right to establish and regulate them was implied in the very creation of such corporations. Having the right to regulate these places for the public good, they would be powerless to carry out that duty if, after the license of an occupant of a s all is revoked or expires, they do not have the same power, through their lawful officers, to expel him, which an innkeeper or a conductor has to protect the guests or passengers, representing the public, who place themselves under his care. The plaintiff had become a trespasser, not by holding over under any contract which gave him the least interest in the premises, but like one who enters an hotel under an implied license, but forfeits his right to remain by misconduct.

The testimony does not show that the officers used more force than was necessary to eject the plaintiff, and therefore, even though they acted under the orders of the commissioners, the plaintiff can recover neither exemplary nor punitive damages. The plaintiff had no right to recover in any aspect of the evidence, and it follows that there was error in refusing the prayer of the defendant for instructions to that effect, while there was no error in refusing to tell the jury that the plaintiff could recover punitive, or any other kind of damage. There was error in the ruling from which the defendant appealed, for which a new trial must be granted; and there was no error in that excepted to by the plaintiff.

Affirmed on plaintiff's appeal. New trial on defendant's appeal.

SEABOARD & ROANOKE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(.....N. C.....)

1. A railroad embankment without sufficient provision for the passage of the water of running streams, if built under lawful authority, is neither an abatable public nuisance nor a continuing private nuisance.
2. Both present and prospective damages can be recovered in a single action for failure to make a sufficient passageway for water through a railroad embankment, provided either party to the action demands that permanent damages be assessed.
3. Judgment for accrued damages only in an action for obstruction of water by a railroad embankment lawfully built, if neither party demanded the assessment of permanent damages, will not be a bar to a future action for permanent damages.
4. The measure of damages for the obstruction of water by a railroad embankment lawfully built is the difference in the value of land as it is and as it would have been with the road properly built.
5. The statute of limitations against an action for obstruction of water by a railroad embankment runs from the time when the first injury was sustained, and not necessarily from the construction of the road.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Northampton County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged maintenance of a nuisance in the form of a railroad embankment which obstructed the flow of water and threw it back upon plaintiff's land to his injury. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. R. Watts and MacRae & Day, for appellant:

Where the damages are of a permanent character, and go to the entire value of the estate affected by the nuisance, a recovery may be had of the entire damages in one action.

Defendant, acting in pursuance of law, having obtained the right of way over plaintiff's land, in the execution of its chartered purpose erected this bridge over the Meherrin river. The structure is a permanent one, placed there for the public use under authority of law, on the defendant's right of way; and if this is the case, the damages for injury caused by its unskilful construction, the depreciation in the value of the land, ought to be recoverable in one action.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ordinarily, where a trespass results in a nuisance, not only is the original wrong actionable, but successive suits may be brought for its continuance, in each of which the damages, if apportionable, can be estimated only up to the time when it was brought, in some of the states, but in this state up to the time of trial. 5 Am. & Eng. presumes that the tortfeasor will desist from keeping it up after being once mulcted in damages, but, where he persists in the wrong, permits continued actions to be maintained against him, as an inducement to its removal. Battishill v. Reed, 18 C. B. 696; Bare v. Hoffman, supra; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 17, note 1. Where the building of a railroad is authorized by law, and is done with reasonable care and skill, it is not a nuisance, and the company is not answerable, after paying the sum assessed or agreed upon by the owner for taking the land occupied for the public use, in any additional damage resulting from the original construction. Adams v. Durham & N. R. Co. 110 N. C. 325; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 20. But even where the injury complained of, either by the servient owner or an adjacent proprietor, is due to the negligent construction of such public works as railways, which it is the policy of the law to encourage, if the injury is permanent, and affects the value of the estate, a recovery may be had at law of the entire damages in one action. Smith v. Point Pleasant & O. R. R. Co. 23 W. Va. 453; Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; Chicago & A. R. Co. 44 Iowa, 11.

The right to recover prospective as well as existing damages in an action depends usually upon the answer to the test question whether the whole injury results from the original tortious act, or "from the wrongful continuance of the state of facts produced by those acts." Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. supra. In this case, which has been cited as authority by text-writers and many of the courts of the states, the action was brought for damages for the occupation of a street and town bridge by a railway company, and it was conceded that in the sense that the highway was obstructed the company had created a nuisance. The court said: "The railroad is in its nature and design and use a permanent structure, which cannot be assumed to be liable to change; the appropriation of the roadway and materials to the use of the railroad is therefore a permanent appropriation; the use of the land set apart to be used as a highway, by the railroad company for the use of their track, is a permanent diversion of that property to that new use, and a permanent dispossession of the town of it, as the place on which to maintain the highway. The injury done to the town is, then, a permanent injury, at once done by the construction of the railroad, which is dependent upon no contingency of which the law can take notice, and for the injury thus done to them they are entitled to recover at once their reasonable damages." "Injuries caused by permanent structures infringing upon the plaintiff's rights in his land, such as railroad embankments, culverts, and bridges, permanent dams and permanent pollutions of water," says Gould in his work on Waters (§ 416), fall within the class where "the plaintiff is required to recover his entire damage, present and prospective." Id. § 582; Duncan v. Sylvester, 24 Me. 482, 41 Am. Dec. 400. In Van Orsdol v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 470, the supreme court of that state held that the negligent failure to construct a railroad skillfully subjected the company to a liability distinct from that arising out of the appropriation of the right of way, and that when the want of care consisted in the omission to build a culvert to carry off the water of a slough, and the diversion of it into another slough, whereby the land of plaintiff was wrongfully injured, the plaintiff could recover damages for the permanent injury done to the land. In the subsequent case of Bizer v. Ottumwa Hydraulic Power Co. 70 Iowa, 147, the court, citing Van Orsdol's Case, said: "Where an injury is permanent, it is such as is spoken of in the books as original,—that is, as accruing wholly when the wrongful acts were done; and is distinguished from an injury which is to be regarded as continuing,—that is, an injury that could and should be terminated, and is to be compensated for strictly with reference to the past, and upon the theory that it would be terminated." Where a railroad company duly authorized by law to construct a railway built an embankment partly on the bed of a river, and thereby changed the current of the stream from its proper course, and caused it to wash away adjacent land, it was held by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. 107 Mass. 354, that a second action, brought to recover damage for the wrongful washing away of more of plaintiff's land, due to the same diversion of the watercourse, was barred by the judgment in the former action instituted for the same purpose, though several acres of land had been washed away after the judgment in the first and before the bringing of the last action. Gray, J., for the court, said: "The embankment of the defendants was a permanent structure, which, without any further act except keeping it in repair, must continue to turn the current of the river in such a manner as gradually to wash away the plaintiff's land. For this injury the plaintiff might recover in one action entire damages, not limited to those which had been actually suffered at the date of the writ; and the judgment in one such action is a bar to another like action between the parties for subsequent injuries for the same cause. Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; Warner v. Bacon, 8 Gray, 397, 402, 405, 69 Am. Dec. 253. This case is not like one of illegally flowing land by means of a milldam, where the change is not caused by the mere existence of the dam itself, but by the height at which the water is retained by it. . . . Nor is it the case of an action against a grantee who, after notice to remove it, maintains a nuisance erected by his grantor." When the same case came up on appeal again (112 Mass. 338, 17 Am. Rep. 106), the court said: "As a general rule, a new action cannot be brought unless there be a new unlawful act and fresh damage. There is no exception to this rule in the cases of nuisance, where damages after action brought are held not to be recoverable because every continuance of a nuisance is a new injury, and not merely a new damage. The case at bar is not to be treated strictly in this respect as an action for an abatable nuisance. More accurately it is an action against the defendant for the construction of a public work under its charter in such a manner as to cause unnecessary damage by want of reasonable care and skill in its construction. For such an injury the remedy is at common law. And if it results from a cause which is either permanent in its character, or which is treated as permanent by the parties it is proper that entire damages should be assessed with reference to past and probable future injury."

In Smith v. Point Pleasant & O. R. R. Co. 23 W. Va., at page 453, the court said: "Where the damages are of a permanent character and affect the value of the estate, a recovery may be had in a suit at law of the entire damage in one action." The action in that case was brought by an abutting owner against a railway company whose road was constructed along the street in his front, and asking an injunction on the ground that he would otherwise be driven to repeated actions at law. High, in his work on Injunctions (vol. 1, § 602), says: "The construction of a railway in a city is not regarded as a nuisance per se, and the laying of its track along a public street will not be enjoined on that ground." Nor can a private property owner, abutting upon and owning the fee to the center of a street, enjoin the construction of an ordinary surface railway in the street on the ground of nuisance. The same principle was recognized by this court in Brown v. Carolina C. R. Co. 83 N. C. 128, where the court refused an injunction and order of abatement on the ground that the structure complained of (a railway trestle) was being used for the benefit of the public. This was an explicit recognition of the doctrine that no structure erected by a chartered railway company, and constantly used by it in serving the public, is to be considered and dealt with as a continuing nuisance because its unskilful and defective construction has injured the land of a neighboring proprietor. Yet it is familiar learning that there is no elementary principle upon which continued actions have been held to lie for the wrongful erection of a structure, except in cases where its erection was a trespass resulting in a nuisance, and then for the purpose of bringing about a removal. It must be conceded, then, that unless a railway embankment or culvert, which obstructs the passage of the water of a non-navigable stream in ordinary freshets so as to pond it back upon and injure a landowner, is a nuisance, the damage, present and prospective, must be assessed in one action. If this is not true, the authorities that we have already cited, and those that we purpose presently to add, embracing cases from the leading courts of the country, and opinions of eminent text-writers, are founded upon a misconception of the law.

In England, where the act of Parliament authorizes the bringing of an action, in such cases as that before us, by a land owner who can show any special injury done to his land by the construction of the road, it was held that a proprietor, whose premises abutted on a highway 50 feet wide, could recover only permanent damages for injury to his land caused by the building of an embankment by a railway covering 20 feet of the highway in his front. Beckett v. Midland R. Co. (1867) L. R. 3 C. P. 82. In Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Esterle, supra, the supreme court of Kentucky rested the ruling in part upon the proposition that an abutting owner upon a street dedicated to the use of the public, having no possession or right of possession in such highway, could not at common law have maintained an action for trespass quare clausum fregit, but must have brought an action on the case. Where the easement of such abutting owner was interfered with by the construction of a railroad, the court held that he could recover a sum representing the diminution in value of his land or lot by the location and use of the railway track in his front. In Cadle v. Muscatine R. Co. supra, which was more nearly in point, the court held that, where an injury to land was due to the unskilful construction of a railroad, the measure of damage was the difference between the value of his property with the road as constructed, and its estimated value with the line properly constructed. In North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 314, the court held that, while the municipality was liable for an injury due to the negligent and unskilful manner of making an improvement by grading its streets, such public work was not a nuisance, and, being of a permanent character, so that no fresh injury could result from it, the damage, present and prospective, should be assessed in one action. In Meares v. Wilmington Comrs. 9 Ired. L. 73, 49 Am. Dec. 412, the plaintiff brought an action on the case to recover damage for the unskilful and negligent grading of a street in his front. The court there affirmed a judgment for permanent damage, and sustained the view that a corporation, authorized by law to do such work, could incur no liability in having it done, except for injuries due to careless construction. The same principle was applied, as we have seen, in Brown v. Carolina C. R. Co. supra, to quasi public corporations. After having given its sanction to the proposition that, though the unskilful construction of a track or bridge by a railroad company may cause special damage to a neighboring land owner, the structure is not a nuisance, it would seem that authority as well as reason would lead to the adoption by this court of the rule that permanent damage can be recovered for such injuries, as well as for the same kind of wrong on the part of such public agencies as cities and towns. In White v. Northwestern N. C. R. Co. 113 N. C. 610, 622, 22 L. R. A. 627, where it was found that a railway company, regularly chartered, had built its track upon a street by a license from the city, Chief Justice Shepherd, speaking for the court, said: "If this be so, the plaintiff may maintain a common-law action for damages, to be assessed up to the time of the trial or it seems she may sue for the permanent damage, if any, which has been inflicted upon her property by reason of the location and construction of the defendant's road, and by so doing confer upon the defendant (so far as she is concerned) an easement to occupy the street." Here we find the doctrine laid down that in a case where the railroad is not proceeding strictly under its statutory authority to condemn the plaintiff can at his election bring an action for the trespass or for the permanent damage. It must be acknowledged that the ruling in that case is in conflict with some other obiter expressions, but is more nearly in harmony with the current of authority elsewhere. The question whether the damages should be assessed for the permanent injury, or whether repeated actions should be brought, was not directly raised, either in Knight v. Albemarle & R. R. Co. 111 N. C. 80; Adams v. Durham & N. R. Co. supra, nor in Spilman v. Roanoke Nav. Co. 74 N. C. 675. The two first opinions were, in so far as they referred to that subject, obiter. While there is some conflict of authority, it seems manifest that it is contrary to public policy to have every embankment abutting on a stream, and every trestle and culvert under which a natural watercourse flows, made subject to the uncertainty of being declared a nuisance upon the finding of a jury that it is not properly constructed. No such mischief as a wilful omission to provide suffcient waterways is to be apprehended where it entails a liability for any diminution in the value of land consequent upon such negligence. Such a remedy affords adequate protection for all injury, without interfering with the discharge by the corporation of its duties to the public. The injury inflicted by a railway company occupying land, held in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, by reason of unskilful construction of embankments, culverts, or bridges, is to be distinguished from the obstruction by it of a navigable river without lawful authority. Such streams being public highways, an obstruction to the navigation of them is a public nuisance which may be abated by anyone "who is annoyed thereby." State v. Parrott, 71 N. C. 312, 17 Am. Rep. 5; State v. Dibble, 4 Jones, L. 107; Wood, Nuisances, § 730. The railway company is in the lawful occupation of every foot of its way that it is authorized by law to take, and where, by neglect in constructing its road, injury is done that is not covered by the compensation made for taking, public policy requires that the additional damage should be compensated for in one action, rather than that a quasi public servant should be subjected to continual annoyance by suits allowed by law only upon the theory that they will lead to the removal of the structure, or some portion of it. The law does not contemplate that such petty annoyances as being compelled to tear down embankments abutting on every little stream, trestle, and culvert shall impair the efficiency of railways as safe and expeditious carriers of freight and passengers. When we attempt to evolve a consistent and reasonable rule for assessing damage for injuries due to the careless building of bridges, embankments, and trestles, we are confronted not only with the obiter expression referred to, but with the fact that the rule laid down obiter in Knight v. Albemarle & R. R. Co. is not easily reconcilable with that followed on the first appeal in Emery v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 102 N. C. 228, 229, though it appears that the question raised on both appeals was whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. When the same case was again before the court on appeal (109 N. C. 589, 15 L. R. A. 332), the discussion was confined to contributory negligence and to the doctrine of the ideal prudent man, as to which it has been overruled in Hinshaw v. Raleigh & A. A. L. R. Co. (at this term) 118 N. C. ——.

The legislature may empower a steam-railway company, which already has the license of a city to occupy a public street with its track, to take in the exercise of the right of eminent domain whatever interest abutting proprietors have therein, or to make compensation for whatever injury they may sustain, as holders of rights or easements in the street, by reason of the construction and operating of the road. It has been decided in White v. Northwestern N. C. R. Co. supra, that where no such steps had been taken, but the streets were occupied under a license from the municipality, the abutting owner might elect to waive the want of authority to condemn, and to demand damages, present and prospective, or to ask compensation only up to the time of trial.

In some of the states, and, it seems, in England, where suit is brought for an injury to land in the nature of a private nuisance created by an individual, the judgment in the first suit of this nature may be pleaded in bar of recovery in any subsequent action for the same nuisance. The court of Illinois drew a very nice distinction in such actions between cases where the nuisance is alleged as the cause of action and where it is brought for diminution in the value of the land by reason of the nuisance. In that case (Illinois C. R. Co. v. Grabill, 50 Ill. 241) the injury complained of by the owner of a lot grew out of the erecting and maintaining cattle pens near his premises. The court held that he might elect to bring an action solely for the nuisance of rendering the air unwholesome, and in that event a similar recovery might be had in a suit brought to any succeeding term while the nuisance should be kept up. But it was also held that where the plaintiff declared for the depreciation of his land, as well as for the annoyance of the nuisance to him while occupying the premises, permanent damages would be allowed, and the judgment would operate as a bar to any subsequent suit for injury due to the erection of the pens. An intimation that such an election may be made in all cases where a nuisance presents the two aspects of constant annoyance and of diminishing the value of land in the vicinity is made in a recent case decided by the court of West Virginia. Watts v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 39 W. Va. 196, 23 L. R. A. 674. In Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. supra, the supreme court of Massachusetts laid stress upon the fact that the plaintiff in the first action had declared, not only for the injury in washing away about 30,000 cubic feet of earth, but in that "the residue of said parcel by reason of the premises has been greatly lessened in value," and the fact that the assessment had been made upon such a complaint and the damages accepted was assigned as a reason for holding that the new action was barred by the record and judgment in the former suit. The better opinion is that in all such cases prospective damages may be recovered if demanded by the plaintiff, and that the defendant railway may also, at its option, elect to have a permanent assessment made. Successive actions being permitted as an inducement to remove the nuisance, no such reason exists where the structure, on account of its public nature, is not in law a nuisance. Upon this principle, where a plaintiff elects to annoy a corporation which owes duties to the public, and there is danger that its efficiency as a public servant may be thereby impaired, the defendant has an equity to compel the assessment of the entire damages in a single action. This equitable right was enforceable under the former practice by a bill in chancery, but under the Code may be asserted by demand in an answer. Where the law declares the damage in its essential character permanent, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the fundamental principle that it is in the interest of the public that there should be an end of litigation. Even where the trespass results in a continuing nuisance for which repeated actions lie, it is a well-established principle that the plaintiff can file his bill to prevent multiplicity of actions, and have his entire damages assessed at once, or, to state it more accurately, may obtain an order that upon the payment of permanent damages no injunction shall issue. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 271; 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 727. On the other hand, the right to appeal to a court of equity for protection against vexatious litigation must be extended also to a defendant where it appears that the plaintiff has elected to annoy him with a succession of suits, the subject-matter of all of which may be settled in a single action. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 254. It being once conceded that present and prospective damages are recoverable, a quasi public corporation not only has the clear equity of all other defendants to be protected against vexation, but to appeal to the courts upon the additional ground that the public may be subjected to annoyance by any proceeding which is calculated to impair its capacity to serve its patrons. The Code of Civil Procedure is founded upon the principles and practice of courts of equity, rather than courts of law, and the provision for consolidating actions that may be disposed of by a single trial is but an affirmance of the equitable doctrine of preventing a multiplicity of suits.

Upon a careful consideration of the authorities already cited and those that will be added, and the reasons on which they rest, we deduce the following principles as decisive of the questions involved in this appeal:

1. A railway company that has constructed its road under lawful authority creates neither an abatable public nuisance nor a continuing private nuisance by failing to leave sufficient space between embankments, or by means of culverts, for the passage of the water of running streams, in case of any rise in the streams that might reasonably be expected; and the injury due to that cause may be compensated for by the assessment of present and prospective damages in a single action.

2. It is the legal right of either plaintiff or defendant to elect to have permanent damages assessed in such an action upon demand made in the pleadings, and when either makes the demand the judgment may be pleaded in bar of any subsequent action. The defendant is required to set up this or any other equity upon which it relies, as well as to prove the averment on the trial. But where a plaintiff is allowed, without objection, to have such damage apportioned, the judgment is not a bar, and either party to a subsequent suit involving the same question may demand that both present and prospective damages be assessed, and upon proof of a previous partial assessment the jury may consider that fact in diminution of the permanent damage.

3. The measure of damage is the difference in the value of the plaintiff's land with the railway constructed as it is and what would have been its value had the road been skilfully constructed. Cadle v. Muscatine R. Co. supra.

4. The statute of limitations begins to run in such cases, not necessarily from the construction of the road, but from the time when the first injury was sustained. Van Orsdol's Case, supra, at page 473, 56 Iowa.

Having set up in its answer that the damage was permanent, and excepted on the trial to the refusal of the court to submit an issue involving that question, the defendant is entitled to a new trial. It is not necessary to pass upon all other questions discussed. Indeed, we did not understand counsel to seriously insist that the suit in Virginia could be pleaded in bar here, or that any injury done to land in another state could be considered in this action.

New trial.

COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK OF CHARLOTTE

v.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF GASTONIA et al., Appts.

(.....N. C.....)

A stipulation stamped on the face of a check that it will not be paid if presented through a specified agency may be upheld to prevent any right of action on the check by the prohibited agency.

(April 21, 1896.)

NOTE.—The question in the above case is believed to be substantially a new one. On the general subject of the negotiability of checks, see note to Famous Shoe & C. Co. v. Crosswhite (Mo.) 26 L. R. A. 568.

As to the effect of sending a check directly to the drawee bank, see note to Anderson v. Rodgers (Kan.) 27 L. R. A. 248.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Gaston County in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a check. Reversed.

Messrs. Jones & Tillett, for appellants:

The holder of a check can in no case maintain an action against the bank upon which the check is drawn until after the acceptance of the check by the bank.

The stamp placed upon the check to the effect that the check would not be paid to the Gastonia Banking Company or its agent, constitutes a part of the check.

2 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 506.

According to the universal custom and usage prevailing in the commercial world, checks are drawn, received, and paid upon the accepted theory that the holder of such paper has the absolute right to demand their payment by the bank upon which they are drawn; and that the banks recognize a corresponding and imperative duty on their part to pay the same upon presentation.

Defendant's attempt to limit or restrict the negotiability or assignability of the check by the stamped indorsement thereon was void in so far as it attempted to thereby deprive the plaintiff (or other holder of such check) of the right to employ the Gastonia Banking Company to collect the same from the defendant bank.

This custom of crossing checks sprang up in England as a matter of convenience and precaution—to facilitate collections on the one hand and prevent mistakes and forgeries on the other. But upon investigation we find that it took two statutes of England to make such "crossed" indorsements binding on the subsequent holder of such checks.

Bellamy v. Marjoribanks, 7 Exch. 389; Simmons v. Taylor, supra; Smith v. Union Bank, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 31.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The holder of a check cannot maintain an action against the bank upon which the check is drawn until after the acceptance of the check by the bank. National Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 153, 19 L. ed. 897; Hawes v. Blackwell, 107 N. C. 196; Marriner v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. 113 N. C. 53. This is the uniform line of decisions in the Federal courts and our own, and it is sustained by the overwhelming weight of authority in other courts, though there are a few decisions in other states to the contrary. The bank is the agent of the drawer. Till acceptance of the check, it has assumed no liability to the payee. Its liability, if any, is to the drawer whose checks it has agreed to pay if it has the drawer's funds in hand; and for breach of that contract it is liable to the drawer, not to the payee. "To its own master, it must stand or fall." A check is simply an order given by the principal upon his agent, and it is always open to the principal to countermand an order to its agent before it is executed; and there are occasions, when it is important to prevent imposition, that the drawer should have power to stop the payment of his check without casting any liability upon the drawee. If the principal, the drawer, die before a check is presented, it becomes invalid, which could not be the case if the mere drawing of the check created any liability in the drawee. But the more important point—since it is now presented to us for the first time—is the validity of the stipulation stamped on the face of the check: "This check will positively not be paid to the Gastonia Banking Company or its agents." It appears that the check has never been presented to the drawee, the defendant bank, except by an agent of the Gastonia Banking Company. Consequently, if this restriction is valid, the holder cannot maintain this action against the drawer till the check has been presented to the drawee by some other agency, and payment refused. In England the system of "crossed checks" has long been recognized as valid. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1585*a*; Smith v. Union Bank, L. R. 10 Q. B. 295, which was affirmed on appeal, and is reported in L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 31. By that system there is stamped across the face of the check the name of a certain banker through whom it must be presented for payment, and if presented by anyone else it will not be honored. This does not destroy its negotiability in any wise. The present case does not go that far, but merely stipulates that the check will not be honored if presented through one agency named. This cannot be deemed an unreasonable restriction of trade. Nor is it a boycott. There is no evidence of a conspiracy to injure the agency named, but it is agreed as a fact that it was an effort on the part of the drawer firm to prevent its transactions and the nature and extent of its business becoming known to a rival house by its checks passing through that channel. Besides, if it were a boycott, the parties to it are the drawer and the payee, who accepted the check with that restriction stamped on it. And, if it was an illegal transaction, the check itself, and not merely the stipulation which is part of it, would be void. Ex mala causa non oritur actio. The restriction is a part of the check (Tiedeman, Com. Paper, §§ 41, 42; Benedict v. Cowden, 49 N. Y. 396); and, if it is invalid, the court could not separate the good from the bad (Saratoga County Bank v. King, 44 N. Y. 87), but it would all be bad, and the holder could not recover. In analogy, a conveyance of property, real or personal, with a condition not to alien to a certain person or class of persons, or for a certain time, is valid. Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 57, 25 L. ed. 548; Gray v. Blanchard, 8 Pick. 288; Shep. Touch. 129, 131; Co. Litt. 223. In Smith v. St. Lawrence, 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 175, 50 Am. Dec. 556, this court held that a note could be limited so as to be payable to the payee only. But it is not necessary to consider here the principle maintained in that case,—that the drawee can, by stipulation therein, make the check not assignable; for this is not attempted here, but there is simply a stipulation that it shall not be paid if presented through the agency named. Wilcoxon v. Logan, 91 N. C. 452, holds merely that where a note is made payable to A. B., without the addition of the words "or order" or "bearer," the holder thereof can maintain an action thereon, being the party in interest. There was no question raised as to the validity of an express stipulation that the note could not be assigned at all, or would not be honored if presented by a particular party, as in this case; nor by any party except one named, as in the case of the English "cross checks." These questions could not arise, for there was in that case no stipulation to either effect. On the facts agreed, judgment should have been entered for the defendants.

Reversed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

v.

(95 Tenn. 579.)

The fraud of a bank in receiving a note for collection when insolvent will not alter the rule that collections made under directions to remit "by draft" will not be impressed with a trust giving a preferential claim against the bank's assets.

(November 12, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals affirming a decree of the Chancery Court for Washington County in favor of defendants in an action

---

NOTE.—Trust in proceeds of collection made by bank when insolvent.

I. As against claims of bank's representative.

II. As against claims of subagent.

When the attempt is made to enforce the trust against assets in possession of a receiver of the bank the decisions on some branches of the question are harmonious while upon other branches directly opposite rules have been adopted.

Where title has passed to bank.

The rule is general that if the title to the paper from any cause has passed to the bank, the former owner loses all interest in the paper as such, and in its proceeds, and becomes simply a general creditor of the bank with no greater rights than those possessed by other general creditors.

If a customer of a bank deposits a note for collection which is immediately credited to his overdrawn account, the note becomes the property of the bank, so that in case of its insolvency the depositor cannot recover the proceeds, although they do not reach the bank until after the insolvency and in the meantime he has made good the overdraft. Re Bank of Madison, 5 Biss. 515, 9 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 184.

If the bank receiving the drafts has an immediate right to credit them to the sender and does so, by which act the sender is given a right to draw against them, the fact that the bank closes its doors before it actually receives the proceeds will not give the sender a right to the proceeds in the hands of the receiver. First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 39 Fed. Rep. 231.

Where the course of dealing between two banks was that all checks sent for collection were credited when received and all notes and drafts when paid, but the amounts of checks not finally paid were charged back and the amounts collected were not kept separate but were mingled with the other funds of the bank, if a check was received in payment of a note and the amount credited, but the bank failed before the check was collected, the check passed into the hands of a receiver as an asset of the bank because in view of the course of dealing the collecting bank had become the debtor of the transmitting bank had made the check its own. Franklin County Nat. Bank v. Beal, 49 Fed. Rep. 606.

But if the property in a note without purchase or advance is to vest in an agent or correspondent for collection, he must become absolutely responsible to his principal for the amount. Dickerson v. Wason, 47 N. Y. 439, 7 Am. Rep. 455; Scott v. Ocean Bank, 23 N. Y. 289.

If a check is deposited for collection no title passes to the bank where the custom of the bank is to treat it as a bailment until collected, although it is marked for deposit; and if the bank becomes insolvent before the collection is made it will acquire no title to the proceeds. Beal v. Somerville, 50 Fed. Rep. 647, 17 L. R. A. 291, 5 U. S. App. 14.

In Fifth Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 40 Fed. Rep. 46, it is held that if the paper is indorsed "For collection" the title does not pass to the collecting bank so as to cut off the trust, although it is under a course of dealing by which the paper is credited upon receipt, and becomes immediately subject to draft and interest on daily balances. And the transmitting bank will be the owner of the paper until its collection or the credit is drawn on. The true criterion for determining the question of title is whether or not the depositor intended to part with the title and the receiving bank intended to purchase the paper and assume the risk of payment and give an absolute credit for it. Under such circumstances, if the paper is received subject to payment so that it may be charged back if not paid, the depositor may intercept the proceeds before they have actually reached the collecting bank. And that decision was followed in First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 42 Fed. Rep. 193.

Effect of insolvency at time of receiving paper.

Upon the question whether or not the title has passed to the bank, the fact that at the time of receiving the paper the bank was insolvent has in some cases had a material bearing.

It has been held that if the checks are marked for deposit and credited immediately in the pass book of the depositor as cash, the title will pass to the bank, although it is the custom of the bank to charge back checks not paid and the depositor has never drawn against checks, but if, at the time of the receipt of the checks, the bank is insolvent to the knowledge of its officers, and the checks are not collected before the bank closes its doors, the depositor may recover them from the receiver because on account of the bank's fraud no title passed to it. Somerville v. Beal, 49 Fed. Rep. 790.

If the bank is so far insolvent that its drafts have gone to protest at the time it receives drafts on deposit, the contract may be rescinded and the drafts recovered by the depositor, although they were credited to him as cash. Cragie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131.

If at the time of receiving the paper the collecting agent is, to the knowledge of its officers, hopelessly insolvent, the holder of the paper may, although his indorsement was in blank recover it brought to establish a preferential claim upon assets of the Johnson City First National Bank. Affirmed.

Messrs. Kirkpatrick, Williams, & Bowman, for appellant:

It was a fraud in the bank to do business in a state of hopeless insolvency, known to its officials. This fraud preceded the attaching of the relationship of debtor and creditor,—in fact brought that relationship into existence,—and, in contemplation of law, made the depositor a cestui to the bank as trustee.

The trust relation established, it will be presumed that the bank paid out of its own funds and not those of the cestui. Of the funds that came to the hands of the receiver exceeding this trust fund, a recovery will be permitted.

from the possession of the subagent to which it was sent for collection, but which has not actually received the proceeds. First Nat. Bank v. Strauss, 66 Miss. 479.

If checks are received on deposit when the bank is hopelessly insolvent and within a few moments before it closes its doors, and are collected afterward by an agent of the bank, the proceeds are held by the receiver in trust for the depositor because of the fraud of the bank in receiving the deposit under such circumstances. Wasson v. Hawkins, 59 Fed. Rep. 237.

In one case it was held that if the draft is deposited for collection with a bank with which the depositor keeps an account, and the value of it is immediately credited to his account, the depositor cannot recover the amount of the draft from the bank's receiver, although it was insolvent at the time the deposit was received and it closed its doors before the proceeds of the draft were received by it. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 23 Blatchf. 489, 27 Fed. Rep. 243. But in that case the court expressly states that the question of fraud was not raised by the pleadings.

The supreme court, however, held that there was enough in the pleadings to raise the question of fraud, and that it was a fraud on the part of the bank to take the paper when insolvent, and that the course of dealing did not show that it had made it its own, and therefore since the paper was not collected until after it closed its doors the paper was a trust fund in the hands of the receiver. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683.

In Peck v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Fed. Rep. 357, where the collecting agent was insolvent to the knowledge of its managing officer when it received the paper for collection, the court held that its fraud in taking the paper without disclosing its condition prevented its getting title to the paper, and since the paper was indorsed for collection and the bank closed its doors before the collection was actually made, the subagent was not permitted to hold the proceeds as against the true owner. But the same result would have been reached without the intervention of the fraud doctrine, so that the case is not necessarily an authority on that question.

If, when checks are deposited with a blank indorsement, the bank is not thought to be irretrievably insolvent, there is no such fraud that the owner can impress a trust on the general funds of the bank for their proceeds in preference to other creditors of the bank. Terhune v. Bank of Bergen County, 34 N. J. Eq. 367.

And it has been held that knowledge of insolvency on the part of the bank officers is not sufficient to avoid its transaction on the ground of fraud unless the directors of the bank have such knowledge. Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675, 15 Rep. 518.

So another case has held, that a bank is known by its officers to be insolvent when it receives from its correspondent a draft for collection does make the proceeds a trust fund recoverable by the correspondent bank from its receiver if the funds are collected and mingled with its own funds before any proceedings are instituted to put it into liquidation. Illinois Trust & S. Bank v. Smith, 21 Blatchf. 275 S. C. sub nom. Illinois Trust & S. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 15 Fed. Rep. 858.

The ground of that ruling was that the fund could not be traced into the hands of the receiver.

Where title has not passed, and the paper or its proceeds are in hands of receiver.

When at the time the bank closes its doors the paper is still in its possession uncollected, the owner may reclaim it from the receiver.

If the draft remains in the possession of the bank at the time of its insolvency the proceeds of it will be a trust fund in the hands of the receiver of the bank for the benefit of the owner. Jones v. Kilbreth, 49 Ohio St. 401.

Collections made after suspension are held in trust for the owner. Jockusch v. Towsey, 51 Tex. 129.

Money collected by the assignee after the assignment may be recovered by the owner of the paper. Re Commercial Bank, 2 Ohio N. P. 170.

Collection of paper deposited with a bank indorsed for collection after it has closed its doors will not vest the title to the paper in the bank, nor prevent the owner from recovering the proceeds from its receiver. Tyson v. Western Nat. Bank, 77 Md. 412, 23 L. R. A. 161.

Checks deposited by a customer with his banker for collection do not become the property of the banker unless they are necessary to make good an overdraft or are immediately drawn against. And if they are not collected until after the bank closes its doors the depositor is entitled to the proceeds. Balbach v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. Rep. 675, 15 Rep. 518.

If the business of the bank is stopped before the collection is made, and the proceeds come into the hands of the bank's representative, the owner may recover them from him and they cannot be applied to the uses of the bank. Re Havens, 8 Ben. 309.

If bills not due are paid in to a banker and placed to the credit of the customer, but not drawn against, they may be recovered from the assignee in case the banker becomes insolvent before they become due and are collected. Giles v. Perkins, 9 East, 21.

Proceeds capable of distinct identification.

If the proceeds of the paper are in such form that they can be readily identified in the receiver's hands, the owner may still reclaim them although the paper itself has been surrendered up for cancelation.

The proceeds may be collected from the receiver if they are traceable in his possession. Mad River Nat. Bank v. Melhorn, 8 Ohio C. C. 191.

its doors, the owner may recover the proceeds from the possession of the receiver. Levi v. National Bank, 5 Dill. 104.

If foreign paper is deposited for collection, and a collection receipt taken, and a New York draft received for the amount, after which a credit is entered to the depositor and the draft deposited in a third bank to the credit of the collecting agent, and then the collecting agent closes its doors with more than the amount of the draft on deposit with the third bank, the owner of the paper may recover his demand out of the funds in possession of the third bank. Nurse v. Satterlee, 81 Iowa, 491.

If the fund in payment of the draft is kept separate and distinct from the other cash on the books of the collecting agent, with a memorandum in the cash drawer at the time of failure that the excess of cash belongs to the owner of the draft, the receiver cannot hold the funds as against the owner of the draft. First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 36 Fed. Rep. 59.

If the proceeds of the collection are allowed to remain on general deposit with the subagent, the owner may recover them from his possession. Lafort v. Carpenter, 91 Hun, 76.

Although the collecting agent has a right to mingle funds collected with its own funds, such right terminates when it has closed its doors, and if at that time paper received for collection is uncollected in the hands of its correspondent when the collection is made the proceeds may be reached by the principal. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 2 L. R. A. 699.

The fact that a bank which received a draft for collection and credit, and in turn transmitted it to a correspondent to have the collection made, credited its owner with the proceeds upon being notified that it had been paid, will not, in case the bank becomes insolvent before receiving such proceeds, give its receiver any right, as against the owner of the draft, to demand them from the subagent. And the rights of the parties are not changed by the fact that the indorsement was in blank and a usage between the banks was that proceeds of collections should be credited on account instead of being immediately remitted. Armstrong v. National Bank, 90 Ky. 431, 9 L. R. A. 553.

If when receiving the draft the collecting agent refuses to credit the amount to the owner but forwards the draft for collection and fails while the proceeds are in the hands of its subagent, its receiver upon receiving the fund from the subagent will take it charged with a trust, although upon learning that the draft was collected the collecting agent had credited the owner with the amount. Henderson v. O'Connor, 106 Cal. 385.

If the collecting agent transmits the paper to a correspondent with whom it has no account, but who remits the proceeds of collections at stated intervals, the latter, although the subagent of the former, may, in case of the principal's failure before it credits the proceeds of the draft, be compelled to turn them over to the true owner, and in case they come into the hands of the receiver of the collecting agent he may be compelled to turn them over. National Exch. Bank v. Beal, 50 Fed. Rep. 355.

If the proceeds are not credited by the intermediate agent while it is a going concern, the fund cannot be held by its receiver, and if it contained a restrictive indorsement the bank actually making the collection cannot hold the proceeds as a credit on the account of the intermediate bank. The collecting agent cannot terminate his responsibility as agent until he has fully discharged his duty and has substituted in its place his unqualified obligation as debtor. First Nat. Bank v. Bank of Monroe, 33 Fed. Rep. 408.

But if, after the collection by the subagent, various sums are collected by it on other drafts, and, various sums are remitted to the collecting agent, the owner of the draft has no lien on the funds transmitted by the subagent to the receiver of the collecting agent after his appointment. Reeves v. State Bank, 8 Ohio St. 465.

In Hyde v. First Nat. Bank, 7 Biss. 156, where the bank making the collection had forwarded the money to its principal before the latter closed its doors, it was held that the owner of the paper had no right of action against the bank making a collection on the ground that there was no privity of contract between them. But there is no discussion of the question of trust fund, and in fact the court says that the money was passed to the credit of the collecting agent before its failure, which takes the case out of the line of authorities holding the trust-fund doctrine.

Where a check is an absolute assignment of the fund called for by it, if the subagent after making the collection and mailing its check for the amount closes its doors, the owner of the paper may collect the check out of a fund upon which it was drawn. Farmers' Bank & T. Co. v. Newland, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 329.

The authority to credit the amount of the collection ceases with the closing of the doors of the collecting agent, and if before that time it has received from the debtor only a check the proceeds of which are not realized until after its doors are closed, the fund will be a trust fund in the hands of a receiver. German American Bank v. Third Nat. Bank (U. S. C. C. Mo.) 6 Rep. 484.

Where the paper was sent for collection under an agreement that the collecting agent should remit on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of each month, and there was no intention of opening a deposit account with the collecting agent, the relation between the owner and the bank remains that of principal and agent, and does not become that of debtor and creditor, and upon the insolvency of the collecting bank the sender may recover the proceeds of all which he can identify in the hands of the receiver. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 39 Fed. Rep. 684.

It was equivalent to an agreement that the bank might use the money collected and pay appellant by its own draft. session of the bank, or if the bank used the paper or the money realized on it for purposes of its own, the rule seems to be that there will be no fund to which the trust can attach, and therefore it is not enforceable.

If the collection is made by the collecting bank by receiving a check upon itself and charging the amount against the account of the drawer of the check and crediting it upon the collection account, after which New York exchange is sent in satisfaction of the amount, which cannot be collected because of the failure of the collecting agent, the claim is not a preferred one against the funds in the hands of the receiver, since the funds cannot be specifically identified. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Asso. v. Clayton, 56 Fed. Rep. 759, 13 U. S. App. 295.

If a draft is sent for collection to the bank in which the drawee is a depositor, and upon his acceptance of the draft the amount is simply charged against his account without the receipt of any money by the bank, there will be no fund to which the trust can attach in the hands of the receiver. Freiberg v. Stoddart, 7 Kulp, 157.

The court says this is not the case of a trustee mingling trust money with his own, and therefore the decisions relating to a charge or lien on the whole fund in such case did not apply.

If the bank receiving the note for collection accepts a check upon itself in payment, and merely debits and credits the amount upon its books without setting apart any fund as the proceeds of the check, and after continuing business for several days closes its doors, there will be no trust funds in the hands of the receiver for the benefit of the owner of the note. Sherwood v. Milford State Bank, 94 Mich. 78.

Where the holder of a check sent it by mail to the bank upon which it was drawn and requested that bank to remit by a certain time or return the check, which it failed to do, but did remit a day or two later by a draft which was not paid, and in the meantime charged the check to the depositor as paid, the account being good for the amount, the court says: "It is impossible out of these facts to construct an appropriation or trust which would attach to the general assets of the bank afterwards passing to a receiver, and requiring their application to the payment of the check in preference to all other indebtedness of the bank." People v. Merchants & M. Bank, 78 N. Y. 269, 34 Am. Rep. 532.

But in Arnot v. Bingham, 55 Hun, 553, under facts very similar to the above except that the paper forwarded was a note instead of a check, the bank was held to have been possessed of a trust fund which went into the hands of a receiver and to which plaintiff was entitled. But that case does not consider People v. Merchants & M. Bank, and decides the case upon the question whether or not the title to the paper passed so the collecting agent became the debtor of the owner of the paper, rather than upon the question whether or not there was a fund to which the trust could attach, although it is stated that the transaction between the maker of the note and the bank, by which it received his check upon itself in payment of the note, canceled the note, and charged the check to his account, was in fact a collection of the amount from the general fund in its hands and a special appropriation of that amount to the payment of the note, and that that fund belonged to the owner of the note although mingled with other moneys of the bank. But that case is disproved in Frank v. Bingham, 58 Hun, 580, which was a claim upon the same fund reached in the former case; and the court says that the two cases curiously illustrate the necessity of requiring the actual identity of some portion of the funds which passes to the receiver with a particular trust fund sought to be recovered in the action. Both claims could not attach themselves to the same fund which was not large enough to pay both, and in case the first decision was correct the second claimant would loose his claim although equally meritorious with the former. But Arnot v. Bingham, 55 Hun, 553, was followed in People v. Merchants' Bank, 92 Hun, 159.

Two Mississippi cases have made an exception to that rule.

A bank which receives the check of its customer who has no funds in bank, in satisfaction of paper forwarded to it for collection, and immediately mails its own draft on New York to the owner of the paper to cover the amount, which draft is not paid because of the failure of the drawer, holds the customers' debt on the overdraft in trust so that it may be recovered from the assets which pass into the hands of the receiver. Ryan v. Paine, 66 Miss. 678.

If a person sends paper to a bank for collection, and the bank accepts a check by its customer who has overdrawn his account in payment, and transmits its draft on New York for the proceeds, which is not paid because of its failure, the owner of the paper may impress the fund due from the creditor on his overdrawn account with a trust for the payment of his claim. Kinney v. Paine, 68 Miss. 258.

But a later case holds that if the maker of the check has funds on deposit, and the check is charged against his account, and then the bank forwards its draft in payment of the proceeds, which is not paid because of the bank's failure, the owner of the paper cannot impress its funds with a trust for the payment of the draft. Billingsley v. Pollock, 69 Miss. 759.

And a Tennessee case refuses to recognize the exception, holding that if the bank receiving the draft for collection receives in payment an overdraft upon itself and forwards exchange to the owner of the draft, which is not collected because of the insolvency of the collecting agent, the owner of the draft has no lien on any fund in the hands of the receiver, although the overdraft is subsequently paid to him. Akin v. Jones, 93 Tenn. 361, 25 L. R. A. 523. In that case the instructions accompanying the paper were to remit in New York exchange, and the court held that this was equivalent to an agreement that the money collected might be used by the collecting bank, and precluded any claim of trust funds.

Philadelphia Nat. Bank v. Dowd, 38 Fed. Rep. 172, 2 L. R. A. 480; Spokane County v. Clark, supra; Merchants' & F. Bank v. Austin, 48 Fed. Rep. 29.

Constructive trusts are not trusts at all in the strict and proper signification of the term; but as courts of equity grant the same relief in certain classes of frauds as in fraudulent breaches of trust, the courts have concurred in denominating the relation thus created between the parties as a "constructive trust."

"In applying this principle (constructive trusts), care should be taken to distinguish between actual trusts and those relations which are only trusts by way of metaphor."

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. § 1044, and note 2.

The mere fact that appellant became a creditor of the insolvent bank through the fraud of its president, and that the bank thereby became a trustee ex maleficio, would give her no right to preference over other creditors, unless she can at least trace and identify her money

If a bank receiving paper for collection uses it in balancing its account at the clearing house, there will be no funds in its possession which the owner of the paper can reach in the hands of the assignee. Re Seven Corners Bank, 58 Minn. 5.

If the proceeds of the paper are appropriated by the bank before its assignment the owner cannot recover them. Re Commercial Bank, 2 Ohio N. P. 170.

If the paper is indorsed for collection, the subagent acquires no title to it prior to the collection of the paper, although it is credited to the transmitting bank at the time of its receipt. But as to proceeds which have been collected before the subagent closes its doors, and paid out in the usual course of its business, the transmitting bank is merely a general creditor. National Butchers & D. Bank v. Hubbell, 117 N. Y. 384, 7 L. R. A. 852.

Where proceeds have been mixed by bank with its own funds.

The general rule where the bank has completed the collection and mixed the funds with its own is that the bank is no longer a trustee but simply a debtor, and that the owner of the paper cannot claim a preference out of its assets. Some recent cases, however, following the doctrine of Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696, hold that the court may separate the trust fund from the general assets of the bank although they reached the hands of the assignee in an indistinguishable mass.

A bank receiving a note for collection and remittance, upon making the collection becomes the debtor of the owner of the paper, and is not a trustee. Bowman v. First Nat. Bank, 9 Wash. 614.

If two banks act as collecting agents for each other, and keep a running account of the collections, remitting balances each week, one is simply the debtor of the other, and upon its failure the other cannot impress its assets with a lien. People v. City Bank, 93 N. Y. 582.

If the agreement between two banks is that one shall collect paper for the other and remit daily for the proceeds the relation of debtor and creditor is established as soon as the paper is collected, so that in case of a failure thereafter the funds will not pass into the hands of a receiver charged with a trust. First Nat. Bank v. Davis, 114 N. C. 343; Commercial & F. Nat. Bank v. Davis, 115 N. C. 226; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Davis, Id. 233.

Where the collecting agent is to make collections and remit once each month its relation to the principal is that of debtor not of agent, after money is once in its possession. Re Kingland's Assignment (Minn.) 28 Chicago Legal News, 14.

When the collection is made the bank immediately holds the funds as debtor of the owner of the paper. Tinkham v. Heyworth, 31 Ill. 519.

If the business of the bank is carried on for several days after the collection is made the proceeds become so mixed with the funds of the bank that they cannot be identified in the hands of the receiver so as to be recoverable from him. Merchants' & F. Bank v. Austin, 48 Fed. Rep. 31.

If the paper is sent for collection and immediate returns, but the collecting agent, instead of obeying orders, mingles the proceeds with its own funds before it closes its doors, the fund cannot be followed, but the collecting agent is merely a general debtor of the owner of the paper. Philadelphia Nat. Bank v. Dowd, 2 L. R. A. 480, 38 Fed. Rep. 172.

A collecting bank which after collecting the money fails to pay it over and is placed in the hands of a receiver is not a trustee of the fund after it has been mingled with the funds of the bank so that it cannot be placed into the receiver's hands. Bank of Commerce v. Russell, 2 Dill. 215.

If, after collecting the proceeds of the paper, the agent fails to remit and becomes insolvent with the proceeds mingled among its general assets, equity will not take the amount out of the general fund, but there will remain a simple contract debt which must be collected at law. Bank of Florence v. United States Sav. & L. Co. 104 Ala. 297.

In case a collecting agent fails to remit according to agreement, and becomes insolvent, the owner of the paper must distinctly trace his funds into the hands of the receiver in order to recover them. It is not sufficient for him to show that they went into the general fund, because equity will not separate it from the other items making up that fund. Re Kingland's Assignment (Minn.) 28 Chicago Legal News, 14.

If bankers employed to collect and remit receive the cash and notify their employer that the money has been remitted, but instead of remitting, place to the customers' credit and go into liquidation, the customers are not entitled to a priority out of the general assets of the bank. Ex parte Dale, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 772.

But that case was overruled in Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696.

Taking trust money out of general fund.

Some of the cases have attempted to apply the doctrine of Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696, to funds mixed with bank funds.

In Thompson v. Gloucester City Sav. Inst. (N. J.) 6 Cent. Rep. 328, the court says, in effect: I can see nothing in the argument respecting the impossibility of keeping the money separate when collected. The collecting bank could place such money in an envelope and preserve its identity. Nor can I see any force in the insistment that the entry by the collecting bank upon its books of the sums collected, changed the rights or relations of the parties. It would hardly be safe to say that an agent could make itself a debtor simply as distinguished from an agent, by a confusion of the moneys or goods of his principal, and by then giving the principal credit for the value. Any such doctrine would inevitably compel the abandonment of commercial transactions by means of agents. But no difficulty arises from the confusion of money any more than in every other case where the rightful owner is in pursuit of trust funds. In such cases the owner need not point out the very goods or bills or coins; he does all the law requires of him if he shows that the money came to the hands of defendant impressed with a trust to his knowledge. In every such case the holder must respond either with the article taken or its value.

as a part of the common mass in the receiver's hands.

Where a bank makes a collection it holds the money as trustee for the owner, and in the making of an assignment by the bank for the benefit of creditors the trust character still adheres to the funds in the hands of the assignee. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Asso. v. Morris, 36 Neb. 31; Griffin v. Chase, Id. 328.

If the paper is forwarded under an agreement to collect and return, bearing an indorsement to that effect, the collecting agent will receive the funds as trustee, and in case it mingles the money with its own and becomes insolvent the trust may be enforced upon the money which it turns over to the receiver. Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems, 69 Tex. 489. The court says it may be when the entire mass is once paid away the right to claim a trust in any money or property is forever lost. But if throughout all the trustee's dealings with the funds so mingled together he keeps on hand a sufficient sum to cover the amount of the trust money, the trust should attach to the balance that is found to remain in his hands. But if the proceeds of the notes are directly applied to the payment of the debts of the bank no enforceable trust will attach to the general estate of the bank which comes into the hands of the assignee.

And that case was followed in Hunt v. Townsend (Tex.) 26 S. W. 310.

If, after collecting paper, the bank becomes insolvent, the owner of the paper may claim a trust against the funds which reach the hands of the assignee, although the identical proceeds of the paper never reach his hands and the funds coming to them are less in amount than the face of the paper. First Nat. Bank v. Sanford, 62 Mo. App. 394.

The court says: "We concede that this reasoning proceeds on advanced lines and is seemingly opposed to the weight of authority in other states."

If mortgages are left for collection and not for credit, and the proceeds when received are not credited but carried in a fictitious account until the bank becomes insolvent, the owner may recover them as a trust fund if at no time after their receipt the cash balance was less than the amount of the collections. Re Johnson, 103 Mich. 109.

If the collecting agent does not remit the proceeds, which it has no right to credit to the owner, until after it closes its doors, equity will impress a trust upon its assets for the benefit of the owner, under the rule that if money is mingled in an indistinguishable mass the whole mass will be treated as a trust fund. Windstanley v. Second Nat. Bank, 13 Ind. App. 544.

If instead of remitting as directed the collecting bank credits the proceeds and then fails having cash on hand less than the amount of the collection, the presumption will be that such cash is the residue of the trust money, and will go to the owner of the paper. Boone County Bank v. Latimer, 67 Fed. Rep. 27.

If a draft left for collection is forwarded to and collected by a subagent, who gives credit to the collecting agent and honors his draft to the full amount, the proceeds of which are used in the business of the collecting agent either to pay debts or to increase assets, it goes to the benefit of his estate, and the assets in the hands of his receiver will be subject to the trust. McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 57 Am. Rep. 287; Francis v. Evans, 69 Wis. 115.

But those cases were directly overruled in Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Flanders, 87 Wis. 237, where it was held that if the proceeds of the collection had been disposed of before the assignment the owner of the draft could not claim them from the possession of the assignee.

If paper is sent to a bank for collection and remittance, and it collects the proceeds but sends its own draft in payment, it has not discharged its obligation, and in case it fails before the draft is paid the funds may be reclaimed from possession of the receiver. It makes no difference that the identical money did not pass into the receiver's hands, for in some form it went to swell the assets which fell into his hands. People v. Bank of Dansville, 39 Hun, 187.

It will be observed that the above case, while comparatively recent, is not a decision by the court of last resort, and is not fully in harmony with expressions found in earlier cases of the higher court. The court of appeals has made the following application of the doctrine: If at the time of receiving a draft for collection the bank is hopelessly insolvent and closes its doors before notice of the collection is received, the owner of the draft may follow the fund into the hands of the subagent as against general creditors of the bank, upon the principle that when money held by a person in a fiduciary capacity has been deposited by him in his general account at a bank, the person for whom the money is held can follow it and has a charge on the balance in the banker's hands, and if the trustee mingles the deposit with his own money and draws out some of it on checks generally and in the ordinary manner, the drawer of the checks must be taken to have drawn out his own in preference to the trust money. Importers & T. Nat. Bank v. Peters, 123 N. Y. 272.

II. As against claims of subagent.

In many cases the paper is forwarded to a subagent to have the collection made, and before the proceeds are returned to the collecting agent the latter becomes insolvent and then arises a conflict of interest between the owner of the paper and the subagent, who claims to retain the proceeds upon account of the collecting agent.

When title in collecting agent.

If the title has been transferred to the collecting agent the owner has lost his right to claim the proceeds from the hands of the subagent.

If the check is credited to the owner as cash, the title passes to the bank, and it can confer a good title on its correspondent, which, in case of the insolvency of the former, will prevail over the claim of the owner to the proceeds of the check. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 90 N. Y. 530.

1887; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 252 et seq; Cavin v. Gleason, 105 N. Y. 256, cited in 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 257.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant's bill is filed to have a debt due her declared a preferential claim, to be paid in full out of the funds in the hands of defendant as receiver. There was a demurrer to the bill raising the question of the right of complainant to any priority or preference; and it was sustained, and decree rendered in the court below fixing the amount of complainant's debt, and directing that it share pro rata in the funds in the receiver's hands, but denying it any preference or priority, and dividing the costs equally between the parties. Complainant, by leave of the court, appealed, and assigned errors. The cause was heard by the court of chancery appeals, and the facts were found and decree of the chancellor was affirmed, and complainant has appealed to this court.

If the paper is indorsed in blank, and the owner immediately draws against it, the title passes to the collecting agent, so that in case it is placed with a subagent for collection he may hold the proceeds to apply upon general indebtedness of the collecting agent to him. Clark v. Merchants' Bank, 2 N. Y. 380.

If the transaction by which the bank receives the check is equivalent to a discount by a bank and a deposit of the proceeds by the customer and a credit for the amount in the bank book, the bank owns the check, and the depositor cannot reach it or its proceeds in the hands of a correspondent of the bank. Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Loyd, 25 Hun, 101.

If the owner of the paper indorses it in blank and has a right to draw against it as soon as it is deposited, the title passes to the bank, and the owner cannot recover it from a subagent to whom it was sent for collection, although the bank fails before the owner checks out the amount which was passed to his credit. Ayres v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 79 Mo. 421, 49 Am. Rep. 235; Bullene v. Coates, 79 Mo. 426.

In case of restrictive indorsement.

If the paper is restrictively indorsed the subagent acquires no title which he can assert against the true owner of the paper.

An indorsement for collection not being an actual transfer of a note may be recalled at pleasure. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 699.

An indorsement for collection is subject to recall at pleasure. Dougherty v. Eastburn, 74 Tex. 69.

If the paper is indorsed for collection the subagent cannot withhold it from the true owner if applied on his claim against the collecting agent. City Bank v. Weiss, 67 Tex. 331, 60 Am. Rep. 29.

If there is a restrictive indorsement on the paper the subagent cannot hold it as a credit on an account of the collecting agent. Blaine v. Bourne, 11 R. I. 119, 23 Am. Rep. 429.

If the paper is indorsed for collection the subagent cannot retain the proceeds on general account against the collecting agent. Cecil Bank v. Farmers' Bank, 22 Md. 148; Central Railroad v. First Nat. Bank, 73 Ga. 384.

If the paper is indorsed for collection and the subagent, has notice, at the time it makes the collection, of the failure of the collecting agent, its authority to credit the proceeds is revoked, and it will hold the proceeds for the benefit of the true owner. First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 76 Ind. 561, 40 Am. Rep. 261.

If the paper is indorsed for collection, and is transmitted to a subagent for that purpose under an agreement to remit at certain dates, the fact that the money has been collected and the proceeds debited and credited on the books of the subagent, and the intermediate agent, and of the owner of the paper, will not prevent the owner from recovering the proceeds from the subgent, if, before the proceeds are actually turned over, the intermediate agent fails, although before that time a letter has been posted by the subagent to a third person directing him to credit the account of the intermediate agent with the amount of the proceeds according to a course of business between them, if knowledge of the insolvency was received in time to have intercepted such letter. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hamilton Nat. Bank, 42 Fed. Rep. 880.

If the note is indorsed for collection, and is transmitted by the collecting agent to its correspondent, which collects it and credits the amount to the account of the collecting agent, but does not notify it of the collection before its doors are closed, the proceeds will belong to the owner of the draft, and not to the bank holding the proceeds, although its account with the collecting agent shows a balance against the latter. Re Armstrong, 33 Fed. Rep. 405.

The ground of the ruling is that the restrictive indorsement prevented the passing of title.

If the paper contains a restrictive indorsement the proceeds may be intercepted in the hands of the subagent. First Nat. Bank v. Reno County Bank, 3 Fed. Rep. 257.

If there is a restrictive indorsement on the paper, the bank actually making the collection cannot hold the proceeds in satisfaction of a claim against the correspondent as against the true owner of the paper. Bank of the Metropolis v. First Nat. Bank, 22 Blatchf. 58, 19 Fed. Rep. 302.

If the bills are restrictively indorsed, and are deposited by the collecting agent with his banker as security for past advances, the owner of the bills may maintain trover against the holder for their possession in case of the insolvency of the collecting agent. Treuttel v. Barandon, 8 Taunt. 100.

In one case it was held that the owner who has indorsed in blank may take advantage of a restrictive indorsement placed upon the paper by the bank in sending it forward for collection. Freeman's Nat. Bank v. National Tube Works Co. 151 Mass. 415, 8 L. R. A. 42.

But in another case it was held that if the paper is indorsed in blank the first subagent may resist an action of trover against it by the owner to recover the paper in case the collecting agent becomes insolvent, although the paper was indorsed to it for collection. Cody v. City Nat. Bank, 55 Mich. 379.

Effect of knowledge by subagent of true condition of title.

The subagent is not entitled to retain the proceeds if it knew that the paper did not belong to its correspondent. Bank of the Metropolis v. New England Bank, 47 U. S. 6 How. 212, 12 L. ed. 409.

Rule where the indorsement is in blank.

The difference in opinion as to whether or not past indebtedness is a good consideration for the transfer of negotiable paper has led to some conflict in the decisions upon this question. One line of cases holds that if the paper is indorsed in blank it may be retained by the subagent to be applied upon the account of the one that transmitted the paper to it. Wood v. Boylston Nat. Bank, 129 Mass. 358.

The facts as found are, so far as necessary to be stated, that complainant is a resident of Connecticut, and sent to the First National Bank of Johnson City a note and mortgage on George and wife, citizens of Washington county, inclosed in a letter in the following words:

I inclose herewith note and trust deed and insurance policy on loan of Phebe S. Sayles to F. M. George and wife, also a release of the trust deed. The amount due on the note is $900.00, with interest to be added from Feby. 2, 1894. Will you please notify Mr. George and wife that the papers have been sent you for collection, and, upon his paying to you the amount due, deliver to him the release, and forward draft to me for balance, less your fee.

Very respectfully yours,
Arthur G. Bell.

November 6, 1894, Mr. George delivered to the First National Bank a check drawn by the Magnetic Building & Loan Association on said bank for $1,000, which the president and acting cashier received, and an entry was made on the books of the bank, showing a

If the absolute title is given to the collecting agent, and it forwards the paper to a correspondent for collection, the latter may retain the paper for application upon general account for past indebtedness. Wyman v. Colorado Nat. Bank, 5 Colo. 30, 40 Am. Rep. 133.

If the indorsement placed upon paper delivered to a bank for collection is unrestricted, its correspondent may retain the proceeds upon a general indebtedness of the collecting agent to it, in case the latter closes its doors before it has remitted the proceeds. Vickrey v. State Sav. Asso. 21 Fed. Rep. 775.

In Marine Bank v. Fulton County Bank, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 252, 17 L. ed. 785, in which the question of the relation of the subagent to the collecting agent simply, and not the question of insolvency, was before the court, it is said that the relation of principal and agent between the banks was changed the moment the money received on the notes was placed in the general funds of the bank and the transmitting bank credited on the books of the subagent with the amount. And that therefore the relation was simply that of debtor and creditor.

And the same principle is recognized in Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 483, 21 L. ed. 473.

If the paper contains no restrictive indorsement, and is sent to a subagent for collection, the latter may hold the proceeds in satisfaction of a general balance due it from the collecting agent in case the latter becomes insolvent before the proceeds are paid to the owner. Bank of the Metropolis v. New England Bank, 42 U. S. 1 How. 234, 11 L. ed. 115.

The other line of authorities holds that a bank to which the paper is sent as subagent cannot acquire any better title to it than its correspondent had unless it pays a present valuable consideration for it. McBride v. Farmers' Bank, 26 N. Y. 450, Affirming McBride v. Farmers' Bank, 25 Barb. 657; Lindauer v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 55 Barb. 75; Dod v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 59 Barb. 265; Stark v. United States Nat. Bank, 41 Hun, 506.

Although the note is indorsed in blank the subagent does not acquire any title to it as against the owner for the purpose of applying it upon a general balance due it by the collecting agent. Van Namee v. Bank of Troy, 5 How. Pr. 161.

The mere crediting by the subagent of the proceeds to his correspondent will not prevent the owner of the paper from reclaiming the proceeds from the hands of the subagent. Arnold v. Clark, 1 Sandf. 491.

The subagent cannot hold the proceeds of the draft to apply on account unless it has made advances or given new credit to its correspondent on the faith of the paper. Hackett v. Reynolds, 114 Pa. 328.

If the subagent has made no advances he cannot retain the proceeds. Jones v. Milliken, 41 Pa. 252; First Nat. Bank v. Gregg, 79 Pa. 384.

If the subagent has not given credit on the faith of the draft sent for collection it cannot hold the proceeds on the general balances against the collecting agent in case of its insolvency as against the owner of the draft. Commercial Bank v. Marine Bank, 1 Trans. App. 302, 3 Keyes, 337.

In Naser v. First Nat. Bank, 116 N. Y. 492, it is said that it does not follow from the doctrine that the collecting agent cannot appoint a subagent, that the subagent, unless he has made advances on the paper can, as against the owner, retain the proceeds of it. The owner may revoke the agency and seek the paper or its proceeds in the hands of the subagent.

Although the paper is indorsed in blank, and the collecting bank and its agent have had prior dealings so that the collecting bank owes the agent a balance, the agent cannot retain the proceeds for application upon this balance if the course of dealing does not show that the paper was sent for credit on the account and no new credit was given on the faith of it. Millikin v. Shapleigh, 36 Mo. 595, 88 Am. Dec. 171.

Although the paper is indorsed in blank, the subagent cannot retain it for application upon a claim against the collecting agent, unless it has given new credit upon the faith of it. Lawrence v. Stonington Bank, 6 Conn. 521; Miller v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 30 Md. 392.

In Sweeney v. Easter, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 166, 17 L. ed. 681, subagents to whom paper indorsed for collection was sent were not permitted to hold is as a credit on account of their correspondent as against the true owners of the paper.

Although the paper is indorsed in blank, and is collected by the subagent and placed to the account of the collecting agent, if the subagent makes no advances and gives no new credit on account of it, he cannot retain the proceeds as against the true owner. Wilson v. Smith, 44 U. S. 3 How. 763, 11 L. ed. 820.

A subagent is not entitled to retain the proceeds unless credit was given to the correspondent or balances suffered to remain in its hands to be met by negotiable paper transmitted or expected to be transmitted in the usual course of dealings between the two. Bank of the Metropolis v. New England Bank, 47 U. S. 6 How. 212, 12 L. ed. 409.

In the latter case the court apparently limits the general language used in the same case upon the former appeal as reported in 1 How. 243, supra, which would seem to lead to the opposite result. But since the doctrine of the supreme court as announced in other cases is that a past consideration is good to support a transfer of negotiable paper, the ground of the latter ruling is not clear, and it is also somewhat in conflict with a later case, which holds that if a bank receiving paper for collection sends it to its correspondent for that purpose and fails, the one sending the paper can recover from the receiver whatever is collected by the subagent after the insolvency, but not what was collected and charged by the subagent in the account of the collecting agent before the insolvency was declared. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 148 U. S. 58, 37 L. ed. 367. H. P. F.

collection of complainant's debt. It appears that the president of the bank made out an incomplete certificate of deposit, which was found in the bank a few days afterwards, when its doors were closed. On November 12th, 1894, the bank was placed in the hands of a national bank examiner as an insolvent concern. Before the court of chancery appeals, the contention was that the bank was hopelessly insolvent when the note was received, and this was well known to its president, and that it was a wrongful act to receive the note for collection under such circumstances; and it was further insisted by complainant that the bank, from the time the note was collected until it went into the hands of the bank examiner as receiver, had in cash and cash items largely more than the sum collected on the note, and it was insisted, therefore, that, when the money was received from George by the bank, the latter acted as complainant's agent, and became liable to her as a trustee, and the fund collected became a trust fund; that, being insolvent when the money was collected, the bank never had any title to the funds, because of the fraud practiced in withholding information of its condition; that, having funds sufficient to pay the note and interest all the while after it was received, such funds were presumably the funds of complainant, and payments made by the bank on other accounts were presumably funds derived from other sources; and, finally, that, if complainant's funds were wrongfully commingled with the funds of the bank, it was the duty of the bank to separate them, and not to devolve that task upon the complainant.

We think the question involved in this case is fairly presented and adjudicated in the case of Akin v. Jones, 93 Tenn. 353, 25 L. R. A. 523, where the general rule is held to be that an indorsement for collection vests no title to the paper in the bank, etc., and it may be recovered in specie before collection made; but if the bank make collection before it makes an assignment, even though it be in fact insolvent, it simply becomes an ordinary contract debtor of the owner, and he cannot impress any trust character upon the proceeds; citing 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, 248. There may be special facts which will take the case out of the general rule, and create a trust in the funds collected; and the learned judge who delivered that opinion cited the case of Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems, 69 Tex. 489, and which is relied on in this case, as presenting a case with special facts, and he continues: "But the rule undoubtedly is, that unless there is some agreement or course of dealing whereby the funds are to be held separate and the identical proceeds remitted, the owner of the drafts stands upon no higher ground than the other creditors of the bank in a case where the bank collects the draft prior to making a general assignment." In that case the parties directed the bank of Columbia to send them its check on New York in payment of the proceeds of collection, and this was held to be the determining fact in the record. It was virtually a direction not to send the identical moneys collected, nor to hold them separate, but was an agreement that the bank might use the money collected, and pay the creditors by its own check on New York. In the present case the direction is to "forward draft to me for balance, less your fee," which clearly implies that the bank, after collection, should retain its charges, and forward the balance in its own draft to the sender of the note. The fact that George paid his note to the bank in a check upon itself can make no difference, as it was equivalent to a payment in money, even if the bank had failed the same day. Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 1395, 1456; Howard v. Walker, 92 Tenn. 452.

It is said in this court that the question was not raised in the pleadings whether the complainant and bank stood in the relation of principal and agent, or that of debtor and creditor. We think the question of trust fund is fairly presented by the demurrer, and is, in effect, the same as to whether the bank must hold the funds separate and apart from all others, and remit them in specie, or whether it was authorized to hold the specific money collected in its own vaults, and remit its own check. The question of the fraud of the bank in receiving the note to collect when it was insolvent cannot alter the rule. The contest is not between the complainant and bank alone, but between complainant and the other creditors of the bank, all of whom probably occupy the same position of having been misled into a belief in the solvency of the bank and its reliability for its acts.

We can see no error in the decree of the chancellor, nor of the court of chancery appeals, and they are affirmed, with costs against the complainant.

Compiled Laws is an adequate and speedy remedy, and for that reason a remedy that would have precluded a resort to mandamus after the statute creating the remedy by contest was passed had the remedy by mandamus not been perpetuated by statute, yet the remedy by mandamus was in fact perpetuated by § 1499, Comp. Laws.

3. The statute relating to elections for a relocation of county seats provided that if an election was ordered it should be the duty of the board of county commissioners in the notices for the next general election to notify the voters of the county to designate upon their ballots at such election the place of their choice. The notice actually given was that an election would be held for the purpose, among others, "of voting upon the question of relocating the county seat of Traill county." At the election 1882 votes were cast on this question and the highest number of ballots cast at such election was 1960. Held, that the notice was sufficient; and that even if insufficient the election was not void, it appearing that the voters were not misled by the defect in it.

4. The statute made it necessary that some one place should have "two thirds of the votes polled" to work a change of the county seat to such place. Held, that this meant two thirds of the votes polled on that particular question and not two thirds of the highest number of votes polled on some other question at the same election.

5. After a county-seat election has been ordered and held, and a sufficient vote is cast in favor of some one place to work a relocation of the county seat, the question whether the petition presented to the board of county commissioners praying that such an election be held was signed by a sufficient number of voters is not open to judicial investigation when the board has found that it was so signed.

The particular form and manner pointed out by the statute for giving notice is not essential; actual notice to the whole body of electors is sufficient, and the question in such cases is whether the want of the statutory notice has resulted in depriving sufficient of the electors of the opportunity to exercise their franchise to change the result of the election.

The relators are not proper parties to a proceeding for mandamus.

It is not enough to be a voter and taxpayer, but one must have a special interest in the location of the county seat, independent of that which he holds with the public at large, and the public officers must apply for the writ.

Corliss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal is from a final order in special proceedings. The order denied the relator's application for a peremptory writ of mandamus. The ostensible object of the proceeding was to compel the defendants, who held various offices in Traill county in this state, to remove their several offices from Hillsboro to Caledonia which was at one time the county seat of that county and which is still the county seat thereof unless such county seat has been lawfully relocated at Hillsboro. It is therefore evident that the real purpose of the relators, who are taxpayers in and residents of Traill county, is to settle the question whether there has been a legal change of the county seat of that county from Caledonia to Hillsboro. It is first urged by respondents that mandamus is not the proper remedy. On that point we are clear that the law is settled against their contention. County Seat of Linn County, 15 Kan. 500; Bennett v. Hetherington, 41 Iowa, 142; Ellis v. Karl, 7 Neb. 381; State, Ayres, v. Stockwell, 7 Kan. 98; Todd v. Rustad, 43 Minn. 500; Calaveras County v. Brockway, 30 Cal. 325; State, Bradford, v. Hamilton County Comrs. 35 Kan. 640; State, Currie, v. Weld, 39 Minn. 426; State v. Saxton, 11 Wis. 27; State v. Avery, 14 Wis. 122; State, Sears, v. Burton, 47 Kan. 44; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 79; Merrill, Mandamus, § 125; 2 High, Inj. § 1257. But it is urged that mandamus will not lie because there is another adequate and speedy remedy. We are referred to §§ 1494, 1495, 1496, 1497, and 1498, Comp. Laws, which provide that the validity of a county election may be contested in the courts by pursuing the proceedings specified in these sections. We agree with counsel that this remedy is both adequate and speedy. But the same act which created this new remedy in terms perpetuated the existing remedy of mandamus in such cases. Section 11 of this act (Laws 1885, chap. 54), being § 1499, Comp. Laws, provides that "this act shall not be construed to affect any of the remedies or rights of action or proceedings provided for in the Code of Civil Procedure." Mandamus is one of such remedies. As it could be employed before the act of 1885 was passed, to try the validity of a county-seat election, it can still be resorted to for such purpose for this is the explicit declaration of § 1499. That any taxpayer and resident could apply for the writ in the name of the state is not open to question in this state. State, Dakota Hail Asso. v. Carey, 2 N. D. 36. It is claimed that Hillsboro did not receive the necessary statutory vote to make it the county seat. Section 565, Comp. Laws, under which defendants seek to sustain the validity of the election, provides that if upon canvassing the vote so given it shall appear that any one place "has two thirds of the votes polled" such place shall be the county seat. It is undisputed that Hillsboro did in fact receive two thirds of all the votes polled on the specific question as to the relocation of the county seat; and it is also uncontroverted that it did not receive two thirds of all the votes cast at the same election, the question being voted on at the general election at which of course state and county officers were voted for. The highest number of votes cast for any one officer at this election was 1960. Hillsboro received 1291 votes, or less than two thirds of 1960. In our opinion the vote for Hillsboro was sufficient. The plain meaning of the statute is, that the place having two thirds of the votes polled on the particular question of relocation shall be the county seat. There is nothing in the statute indicating that to work a change of the county seat any one place must receive the votes of two thirds of all the voters of the county. Ample authority supports our decision. Armour Bros. Bkg. Co. v. Finney County Comrs. 41 Fed. Rep. 321; Marion County Comrs. v. Winkley, 29 Kan. 36; Gillespie v. Palmer, 20 Wis. 562; Sanford v. Prentice, 28 Wis. 358; State, Crocker, v. Echols, 41 Kan. 1. The case of State, Mann, v. Anderson, 26 Neb. 517, supports the contention of appellant's counsel. Many authorities are cited by him to sustain his contention that, to work a relocation of the county seat under § 565 to Hillsboro, that place must have received two thirds of all the votes cast at the election. But an examination of these cases will disclose the fact that the language of the constitutional and statutory provisions there construed was radically different from that of our statute. In those cases there was no room for construction. There was a plain statement in the law that to carry the measure before the people or to relocate the county seat a majority of the electors or voters of the county or city or town must vote in favor of it. State v. Winkelmeier, 35 Mo. 103; People v. Wiant, 48 Ill. 263; People v. Brown, 11 Ill. 479; State, Stevenson, v. Babcock, 17 Neb. 188; Enyart v. Hanover Twp. Trustees, 25 Ohio St. 618; Everett v. Smith, 22 Minn. 53; Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Minn. 107; Bayard v. Klinge, 16 Minn. 249. When a majority of the electors is spoken of the highest number of votes cast at the election must furnish the standard for determining whether the particular measure which must have such a majority has been carried. When 1,000 votes are cast at an election, and the particular measure which must receive the votes of a majority of the electors has in its favor only 400 votes, it is obvious that it has not received the vote of the majority of such electors, although there be no votes whatever against it. But our statute contains no such language. It carefully excludes the idea that two thirds of the electors must vote for a place to make it the county seat. When speaking of the number of signatures to the petition required it in terms declares that such petition shall be signed by two thirds of the qualified voters of the county. But when it specifies the vote necessary to relocate the county seat at another place it studiously avoids the use of this explicit language which is very appropriate to express the idea that appellants' counsel contends, is to be found in the statute. To our minds this fact is very significant. It discloses a purpose to avoid making it necessary that there should be a two-thirds vote of the electors of the county in favor of one place to change the county seat to such place. The language which is employed makes it apparent that the two-thirds vote required is a two-thirds vote on the particular question of the relocation of the county seat. The statute declares that in the notice for the next general election the voters are to be notified to designate upon their ballots the place of their choice. Then the statute continues: "And if upon canvassing the votes so given it shall appear that any one place has two thirds of the votes polled such place shall be the county seat." The "votes so given" are the votes upon this particular question. If upon the canvass of such votes without any reference to any other vote at the same general election it appears that any one place has two thirds of the vote polled it shall be the county seat. The "vote polled" is the vote polled upon that question. That is the only matter the statute is dealing with. It is utterly unjustifiable to assume that by these words the legislature meant the highest vote polled at the same election no matter for what office or measure. The statute does not say "the highest vote polled at the same election for any office or measure," and we have no right to interpolate these words into the statute by construction. The general policy of the American people is to test the sufficiency of any vote by the vote on the particular question, and not by the vote on some other question. Unless the language is free from doubt we have no right to spell out of the statute by a far-fetched inference a purpose to depart from this general policy. It is to be observed that whenever the lawmaking power of a state has desired to make the highest vote at the same election the standard it has said so in unambiguous terms, as by requiring that there shall be a majority or two-thirds or three-fifths vote as the case may be of all the voters or electors of a city, town, or county, or by using equally explicit language.

It is next insisted that the election was void for the reason that the notice of election was not strictly in conformity with the statute. The statute declares that if the board orders an election it shall be its duty to notify the voters in the general election notices to designate upon their ballots at the election the place of their choice. Comp. Laws, § 565. The portion of the notice actually given reads as follows: "also to vote upon the question of relocating the county seat of Traill county." This notice was a substantial compliance with the statute. It distinctly informed the voters that that question was to be voted upon and a reference to the law would disclose the fact that each voter might, and must to make his ballot count, designate on it the place he desired to vote for as county seat. This was done by all who voted on the question, and it appears that while the highest number of votes cast for any one office was 1960 there were 1882 votes cast for different places for county seat. It does not admit of doubt that the voters of Traill county were fully apprised by the notice actually given of the question to be voted upon and how they should vote upon it. We recognize the greater importance of a strict compliance with the provisions of law as to notice where a special matter is to be voted upon at a general election, or some officer is to be voted for to fill a vacancy when but for such vacancy there would have been no vote for a candidate for such office at the general election, or when a special election is held as to the time and place of holding which the laws of the state furnish no notice,—than where there is an election of officers at a general election whose terms of office expire under the law so that the public have notice of such election from the statutes of the state without further notice. See Adsit v. Secretary of State, 84 Mich. 420, 11 L. R. A. 534. The rule is that if no notice of a special election or that a special matter will be voted for at a general election is given, and there is an inference from the vote cast that the failure to give the required notice has so operated to the prejudice of the voters that it cannot be said that there has been a fair election held with respect to the special matter, then the election to that extent is void. But, as we observed before, it is conclusively shown by the vote on the question of relocating the county seat in the light of the vote cast at the same time for county and state officers, that no possible injury to the voters resulted from the failure strictly to comply with the requirements of the law. As sustaining our ruling that the defect in the notice did not affect the validity of the election, see: Wheat v. Smith, 50 Ark. 266; State v. Carroll, 17 R. I. 591; Seymour v. Tacoma, 6 Wash. 427; Ellis v. Karl, 7 Neb. 381; State, Malloy, v. Skirving, 19 Neb. 497; Dishon v. Smith, 10 Iowa, 212; Adsit v. Secretary of State, 84 Mich. 420, 11 L. R. A. 534; State, Berge, v. Lansing, 46 Neb. 514.

We also think that there was such a substantial compliance with the statute as to the notice to be given that we would hold the election valid although it appeared that there was a much lighter vote on the question of relocating the county seat than for candidates for office voted for at the same election. The only other attack on the election proceedings made by the appellants relates to the number of signatures to the petition presented to the board of county commissioners requesting that the question of relocating the county seat be submitted to the voters of the county. The statute in terms requires that the petition be signed by two thirds of the qualified voters of the county. The petition presented to the board had upon it 864 names. There is no finding of the court that these did not constitute two thirds of the voters of the county; nor, on the other hand, is there any finding that they did. There is a finding that the board found "that said petition was signed by the necessary number of voters and electors of said Traill county." The records of the proceedings of the board do not disclose the fact that such a finding was made in terms by the board; but it is obvious that the board must be held to have reached such a conclusion from the mere fact that they ordered the election. See Lawrence County Comrs. v. Hall, 70 Ind. 469. We do not think that after an election has been held and a sufficient vote has been cast in favor of a place to work a change of the county seat to such place, the question whether the petition had upon it the requisite number of names is open to judicial investigation. While a sufficient petition is undoubtedly necessary yet the question lies deeper than that. What body is to settle this matter finally? This is the pregnant inquiry. When we consider the nature of the question to be passed upon, the peculiar facilities that county commissioners living in close contact with the people have for reaching a correct result, the enormous expense involved in a trial of that question in court, we are impelled to the conclusion that the decision of the board is final at least after an election is had which demonstrates that the requisite number of voters were in favor of a change. In the case before us it appears that the voters of Traill county were almost unanimous in their desire for a change, Caledonia receiving only 218 votes out of 1882 votes cast on that issue. The board is to receive the petition, to pass upon its sufficiency; and is to order the election if satisfied that it is sufficient. Here is a clear submission of this question of fact to the board for adjudication. The statute contemplates that the board is to settle it one way or the other. No other body is given jurisdiction over the matter. It is left to the judgment of the board to the end that the taxpayers shall not be burdened with the expense of an election unless there is a strong sentiment in favor of a change; and also to the end that when there is a sufficiently widespread desire for a relocation to justify the expectation that the vote on the subject will accomplish something and not prove futile, the citizens of the county may enjoy the right to vote on this issue. We think such a question may be safely left to the final decision of the county commissioners of a county. They are elected for a short term. They stand close to the people and under such circumstances an abuse of the power is not to be expected. If the power is abused the attempt of the board will prove abortive if the voters do not desire a change. The only consequences of their wrongful action will be the expense of the election so far as it relates to the special matter, which will be trifling in view of the fact that the question is to be voted on at the general election, and in addition the increased excitement of the election owing to the additional issue before the voters for settlement. These consequences are trival as compared with the evils flowing from the doctrine that the question whether two thirds of the voters signed the petition is open to investigation after two thirds of the voters have declared in favor of a change of the county seat to another place and so open to investigation for all time. It is to be kept in mind that if this matter can be inquired into in the courts, the issue of fact is not settled by a reference to the poll list, as the question is not with respect to the number of voters at the time of any election but at the time the petition is presented. Where two thirds of the electors must vote for a measure it is obvious that the votes cast at the election will be controlling as to the number of electors. But the number of votes cast at any election is not and cannot be absolutely controlling as to the number of votes at another time. This may be prima facie evidence as to the number of qualified voters at a given time, but the investigation may and will probe deeper. It will always relate first to the question of the exact number of qualified voters in the county, and this involves inquiries into the original citizenship, residence, naturalization, and age of each and every voter in the county, and second, to the same inquiry with respect to the persons whose names are upon the petition and the additional fact whether the signatures are genuine. An exhaustive trial of these complicated facts in court would, in a single instance, involve the expenditure of thousands of dollars, and would occupy the attention of the courts for months. The expense would be enormous as compared with the slight additional expense to the county from ordering an election on the question of relocating the county seat, and it would have to be borne by the innocent public officers who in changing their place of holding their public offices would be acting in obedience to the will of the people as expressed at an election on the subject apparently regular and legal in all respects. Is it possible that years after an election is had at which the people have spoken as decisively in favor of a change as in the case at bar, the whole subject is open to review in the courts, and that the question where the legal county seat is located may after such a lapse of time be made to turn on the issue of fact whether a certain person was twenty-one years of age at the time the petition was signed; or whether at that time he had resided long enough in a certain precinct, or in the county, or in the state, to make him a legal voter; or whether at that time he was a citizen. If so then the county seat of a county may be adjudged to be in another place than that at which the people by a decisive vote have located it, years after such location, by proving that a single person was only twenty years and 300 days old when the petition was presented to the board, or that he had lived in the county only five months and twenty-five days, or in the state eleven months and twenty-five days, at the time of the presentation of the petition to the county commissioners for action thereon. It is evident, too, that after the lapse of even a short period of time it will often become impossible to show that the petition was signed by a sufficient number of voters although such was the fact. Suppose the petition in the case before us had been just sufficient on the theory that every signature was that of a voter, and suppose that on being apprised of the fact there was doubt as to the age of one of the signers of the petition, the board had investigated the fact and had become satisfied that he was twenty-one years of age, how intolerable would be the doctrine that notwithstanding such investigation and decision by the board such question of fact could be re-examined at any time with the result of overthrowing years afterward the clearly expressed will of the voters. We must assume in cases of this kind, as in all other cases, that the board has done its duty and has made a proper investigation. In our judgment their conclusion as to the fact whether the petition has a sufficient number of names of voters upon it is final after the election has taken place. Able courts have taken the same view of the law. Currie v. Paulson, 43 Minn. 411; Ellis v. Karl, 7 Neb. 381; Bennett v. Hetherington, 41 Iowa, 142; Baker v. Louisa County Supers. 40 Iowa, 226; 2 High, Inj. §§ 1257 and 1258. In Currie v. Paulson, Judge Mitchell, speaking for the court, places the doctrine we enunciated in this case upon a solid foundation. The question before the court in that case was whether there was a sufficient number of signatures of voters upon the petition. The court held that in a contest of the validity of a county-seat election under the statute, this question was not open to investigation. In his opinion Judge Mitchell says: "In the very nature of things, the determination of the board on this matter must be final and conclusive. It was certainly not contemplated, and contestants do not claim, that the court upon contest could proceed on new evidence to try de novo the question as to the genuineness of signatures, or the qualification of the signers; for if so the election might be held void although the county commissioners decided rightly upon the evidence before them. If the court is to review the determination of the commissioners at all, it must be by attempting to put itself in their place, and consider how they ought to have decided upon the evidence which they had before them. But the law makes no provision for preserving this evidence, or making up any record of it. If, as will often be the case, the evidence is oral, there is no possible way of ascertaining what the evidence before the board was. This difficulty is illustrated by the present case, in which the trial judge assumes to find what certain witnesses sworn to before the board. There are manifest reasons why the determination of the board of commissioners as to these facts should be final. It is the vote of the electors at the election and not the signatures to the petition, which determines the location of the county seat. The main, if not sole, purpose of requiring the petition in favor of the change before ordering an election is to save the public from the expense, loss of time, and the excitement incident to such an election, unless there is a reasonable probability that the required majority of electors will vote for the change. To go back to the action of the county board, and reverse their determination as to these facts, after the election is past, and the change carried by the popular vote, would certainly subserve no good purpose."

In Edmonds v. Herbrandson, 2 N. D. 270, 14 L. R. A. 725, the validity of this same county-seat election was involved. But this question arose on demurrer. The plaintiffs in that case alleged, and the allegation was admitted by defendants' demurrer, that Hillsboro did not receive two thirds of the votes cast for county seat, but did receive a sufficient vote to make it the county seat under chapter 56 of the Laws of 1890. The only question discussed in that case was whether that statute was valid. The trial court held it was and sustained the demurrer. We came to the contrary conclusion and reversed the judgment of the district court. But it appears that the defendants admitted the fact that Hillsboro had not received two thirds of the votes cast merely for the purpose of settling the constitutionality of the act of 1890. After the case had gone back to the district court an answer was interposed and this fact was put in issue by such answer. A question of fact is not settled by a tentative admission of it for a special purpose. It is only when judgment is entered upon the basis of such a fact that it is no longer open to controversy. Had there been judgment entered in that case by the district court in favor of the plaintiffs on the demurrer the matter would be res judicata. No such judgment was rendered. On the contrary a judgment in favor of the defendants was subsequently entered and this judgment appears from the record in this case to have been founded on the finding by the court that Hillsboro had in fact received the necessary two-thirds vote. But even if it had not been founded upon such fact, but on a wrong theory of the law, it would be conclusive between the parties to such action on the issue whether Hillsboro was the legal county seat until reversed or set aside. It is possible we might legally rest our decision in this case on the conclusive force of the judgment in the case referred to, as there is much force in the contention that there is privity between the parties to that action and the parties to this proceeding, particularly in view of the fact that only public interests were then litigated and the same public interest is herein involved. But we prefer to meet the issues in the case before us on the merits to the end that citizens of the county may not feel that their interests have been trifled with by other citizens who instituted and controlled the former suit. Certain it is that there was no final judgment in that case in favor of those who instituted and prosecuted it, and without such final judgment in their favor there could be no conclusive settlement in their favor of the issue of fact raised by the answer interposed after the case had gone back to the district court whether Hillsboro had received the necessary two thirds vote. What we said in that case on the question of the number of signatures to the petition was not said with any view of settling the law whether the sufficiency of the petition could be inquired into in proceedings to test the validity of the election. No such question was before us for discussion. It was assumed by everyone in the case, for the purpose of settling on the appeal whether the act of 1890 was constitutional, that the change in the county seat could not be sustained under § 565, Comp. Laws. We cannot say from the record before us that the board of county commissioners ordered the election solely under the law of 1890 or under it at all. This fact is not set forth in the alternative writ, and there is no evidence in the case justifying such an inference. The petition presented did not ask that the election be ordered under that statute or refer to it at all. The board in no manner alluded to it in ordering the election, nor is there anything in the proceedings of such board, so far as they are in evidence in this case, tending to show that the board was proceeding exclusively under the act of 1890, or indeed under it at all. When the board canvassed the vote and issued the certificate it spread upon its records nothing to indicate that it made such canvass and issued such certificate on the theory that all of the election proceedings had been carried on under the statute of 1890. There is no testimony whatever in the case that either the petitioners for the election, or the board of county commissioners, did not proceed under § 565 of the Compiled Laws. Had it appeared in this case by competent evidence that the board was acting under the act of 1890 there would be no inference from the fact of ordering an election that the board had found that the petition was sufficient under § 565, the act of 1890 requiring the petition to be signed by only one third of the voters of the county instead of by two thirds of such voters as required by § 565. In the absence of evidence to that effect we have no right to assume that the board proceeded under an unconstitutional statute when there was a valid law under which they could have proceeded.

Finding no error in the case, and being clearly of the opinion that the district court was right in its decision that the county seat had been lawfully relocated at Hillsboro, the order denying the application for a peremptory writ of mandamus is affirmed.

Bartholomew, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, C. A. Christensen and J. E. Stair, commenced proceedings to foreclose, by advertisement, a chattel mortgage given by respondent, the Farmers' Warehouse Association, to the Mann-Frazer Company, a corporation doing business at Minneapolis, Minn., which said mortgage covered two certain frame elevators situated in Richland county, in this state, and was given to secure a promissory note for the sum of $2,850, executed by respondent to said Mann-Frazer Company. Said note and mortgage were dated July 3, 1893, and the note matured October 2, 1893. The foreclosure proceedings were commenced soon after the maturity of the note. The respondent presented to the judge of the district court for said county an affidavit of defense, under the law which is now embodied in § 5884, Rev. Code, whereupon said judge enjoined further proceedings by advertisement, and ordered that all further proceedings for foreclosure be had in the district court, whereupon the matter was transferred to said court, and tried under the provisions of chap. 82, Laws 1893; and a judgment dismissing the action and for costs having been returned against plaintiffs, they appeal to this court, under the provisions of the statute last named. The portion of that statute material to the decision of this case reads as follows: "In all actions tried by the district court without a jury, wherein issue of fact has been joined, all the evidence offered in the trial shall be taken down in writing, or the court may order the evidence or any part thereof to be taken in the form of depositions, or either party may, at pleasure, take his testimony or any part thereof by deposition: provided, that whenever such evidence is taken down in shorthand and written out at length, it shall be deemed to have been taken down in writing, and all testimony so taken in shorthand must, at the request of either party, be so written out at length and filed with the clerk. All evidence taken as provided by this section shall be certified by the judge at any time after the trial, and within one month before the time allowed for the appeal of said cause shall have expired, and shall thereupon become a part of the judgment roll, and the original of such judgment roll shall go on appeal to the supreme court, which shall try the cause anew upon such judgment roll, and render final judgment therein, according to the justice of the case." Under the above provisions, appellants procured the evidence to be properly certified and filed as a part of the judgment roll, and bring up on this appeal the original judgment roll only, no bill of exceptions or a statement of the case having been settled or allowed. Respondent in this court makes a preliminary motion to strike from the files all the record so transmitted to this court, except the notice of appeal, the summons and pleadings, the findings and conclusions of law made by the trial court, and the judgment thereon. In other words, respondent seeks to eliminate from the record everything except what would have appeared in the judgment roll had said chapter 82 never been enacted. The basis of the motion is the alleged unconstitutionality of said chapter 82 in that it attempts to confer upon this court a jurisdiction not contemplated or permitted by the Constitution, and that, being unconstitutional and void, the evidence could only be brought to this court by bill of exceptions or statement of the case under the practice and provisions governing other cases.

The question of the constitutionality of said chapter 82, Laws 1893, has received much informal discussion in legal circles throughout the state since its passage, but this is the first instance where the question has been directly raised in this court, although we have decided several cases that were brought to this court under the provisions of that act. See Taylor v. Taylor, 5 N. D. 58; Nollman v. Evenson, 5 N. D. —. The question is one involved in much difficulty, and upon which the members of this court have not at all times been in entire accord. Broadly stated, the objection urged against this law is that it attempts to confer original jurisdiction upon this court, while under the Constitution, our jurisdiction is appellate only, except in certain specified cases. The constitutional provisions are as follows: Section 86: "The supreme court, except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, and shall have a general superintending control over all inferior courts under such regulations and limitations as may be prescribed by law." Section 87: "It shall have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari, injunction, and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to the proper exercise of its jurisdiction, and shall have authority to hear and determine the same: provided, however, that no jury trial shall be allowed in said supreme court, but in proper cases questions of fact may be sent by said court to a district court for trial." Section 103 of the Constitution, defining the jurisdiction of the district courts, reads: "The district court shall have original jurisdiction, except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, of all causes both at law and equity, and such appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. They and the judges thereof shall also have jurisdiction and power to issue writs of habeas corpus, quo warranto, certiorari, injunction, and other and remedial writs with authority to hear and determine the same." It is apparent from these constitutional provisions that the decision of the question here raised must hinge largely upon the meaning that must be attached to the words "appellate jurisdiction," and "original jurisdiction" as used in that instrument, because it cannot be admitted for a moment, under the wording of our Constitution, that the legislature has power to impose upon us the exercise of any original jurisdiction whatever not specially authorized by the Constitution.

It may aid us to first accurately determine just what this court is required to do under the statute that has been attacked. The statute says that this court "shall try the case anew." This language, it is apparent, was not used with exact accuracy. The case is not tried anew. There is no new evidence or any evidence adduced in this court. The case must be decided upon a record already prepared by a judicial tribunal. This court simply reviews the record, and the practical and necessary result of such review is to correct the errors, if any, either of the law or fact, into which the court below may have fallen. It is difficult to perceive any marked distinction between the jurisdiction exercised by this court in a proceeding of this character and the jurisdiction exercised prior to the enactment of said chapter 82. Sec. 5237, Comp. Laws 1887, in providing what should be done by the supreme court on appeal, contained this provision: "Any question of fact or law decided upon trials by the court or by referee may be reviewed when exceptions to the findings of fact have been duly taken by either party and returned." This provision has been repeatedly acted upon since statehood, and we never heard its constitutionality questioned. In Jasper v. Hazen, 4 N. D. 1, 23 L. R. A. 58, this court took occasion to state at length what duty was devolved upon the supreme court by this provision. We then stated that this court would review questions of fact in proper cases, and would set aside findings of fact, when under the restrictions there stated, this court could see that such findings were not supported by a preponderance of the evidence. Under that provision, the judgment of this court upon the facts was required to the same extent that it is required under the law here under discussion. The judgment of the trial court upon the facts must still have weight and influence with this court, especially when based upon the testimony of witnesses who appeared in person before that court. It may be that the strong presumption of correctness under which findings of fact came to this court under the former practice does not follow them with equal force under this statute, and it may be that to some extent the appellant is relieved from the burden of pointing out the specific error of the trial court. This would seem to follow from the fact that the particular errors of the trial court, if any there be, need not be discussed by this court, or pointed out to the court below, as was imperatively necessary in all cases where a reversal sent the case back for trial de novo. Nevertheless, the independent judgment of this court upon the record presented, irrespective of what the trial court may or may not have held, is based only upon a review of the record made in the trial court; and when the judgment of the trial court was based upon error in law or fact, the judgment of this court necessarily reviews and corrects such error. But the manner in which this result is accomplished is radically different under the two systems of practice. The statute under discussion requires us to render final judgment, and thus, by its mandate, forever terminate the particular litigation. This is such an innovation upon a practice that is familiar to and well settled in the professional mind that it is received with distrust. But to the legislative mind it doubtless suggested a means of terminating litigation in a manner that should at once possess the strongest probability of absolute justice with the least expenditure of time and money. It avoids the delay and expense of a second trial and the risk of further errors that might necessitate a second appeal. If these legislative objects can really be accomplished, the value and propriety of the statute cannot be doubted.

Is there anything, then, in the added duties devolved upon the supreme court, that is beyond the scope of appellate jurisdiction, and that inherently pertains to original jurisdiction only? An appeal is a process of civil-law origin. In England it was in a great measure confined to equity, ecclesiastical, and admiralty jurisdictions, where trial by jury was unknown. As originally used, it removed the entire cause to the superior court, subjecting both law and fact to a retrial. For a review of errors of law in law courts the writ of error was universally used. See United States v. Wonson, 1 Gall. 13, Fed. Cas. No. 16,750; Wiscart v. Dauchy, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 327, 1 L. ed. 622; United States v. Goodwin, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 110, 3 L. ed. 285. Appellate jurisdiction is defined in 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 629, as "pertaining to or having cognizance of appeals and other proceedings for the judicial review of adjudications." In a code state it is thus defined: "Jurisdiction to revise or correct the proceedings in a cause already instituted and acted upon by an inferior court or by a tribunal having the attributes of a court." Auditor of State v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 6 Kan. 505, 7 Am. Rep. 575. And again: "Appellate jurisdiction is, not only a continuation of the exercise of the same judicial power which has been executed in the court of original jurisdiction, but it necessarily implies that the original and appellate courts are capable of participating in the exercise of the same judicial power." Piqua Bank v. Knoup, 6 Ohio St. 391. And, for full discussion of this jurisdiction, see Elliott, App. Proc. §§ 16 et seq. We find no definition of appellate jurisdiction so limited that it will not permit the appellate court to review the facts as well as the law if the legislature so requires. As we have seen, the supreme court of the territory of Dakota, at the time of and prior to the adoption of our Constitution, was expressly required to review facts in certain cases, under § 5237, Comp. Laws. We have no warrant for saying that the constitutional convention intended to curtail that jurisdiction. Nor have we any warrant for saying that such convention used the words "appellate jurisdiction," in § 86, of the Constitution, in any other or different sense from that given to the same words in § 103, defining the jurisdiction of the district courts. And when, in the latter section, it is declared that the district courts shall have "such appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law," it is not meant that the legislature may define appellate jurisdiction, and make it mean one thing in one case, and a different thing in another case. It is only meant that it shall have appellate jurisdiction in such cases as the law may declare. It is undisputed that the appellate jurisdiction in such courts may be exercised by a strict trial de novo, upon new pleadings and entirely new evidence. But it is entirely competent—and it is almost universally done—for the legislature to declare that in certain cases, involving only small amounts, the appellate jurisdiction of those courts shall be exercised only in the correction of errors, and such provisions do not affect the question of appellate jurisdiction but of appellate procedure. In Story on the Constitution (§ 1761), that learned author, in discussing the appellate jurisdiction of the Federal Supreme Court, says: "In the first place, it may not be without use to ascertain what is here meant by appellate jurisdiction, and what is the mode in which it may be exercised. The essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction is, that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and does not create that cause. In reference to judicial tribunals, an appellate jurisdiction therefore, necessarily implies that the subject-matter has been already instituted in and acted upon by some other court, whose judgment or proceedings are to be revised. This appellate jurisdiction may be exercised in a variety of forms, and indeed in any form which the legislature may choose to prescribe; but still, the substance must exist before the form can be applied to it." We know of no clearer statement of the points under discussion than is contained in Judge Story's language. Appellate jurisdiction cannot create a cause. It must be first created and adjudicated by another judicial tribunal. Those facts existing, the appellate court may exercise its jurisdiction in any form the legislature may prescribe. The legislature may require the appellate court to review the facts, and render final judgment. If in so doing, it exercise some of the same functions as a court of original jurisdiction, we answer that there is neither constitutional nor legal reason why it should not. Judge Elliot clearly shows that the power to render and enforce judgments is and must be inherent in every appellate court. The Constitution of the state of Iowa (§ 4, art. 5) reads: "The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and shall constitute a court for the correction of errors at law under such restrictions as the general assembly may, by law, prescribe." Ever since Preston v. Daniels, 2 G. Greene, 536, the supreme court of that state has uniformly held that it had no original jurisdiction; but it has also uniformly held that the Constitution gave an absolute right to a trial de novo in that court in chancery cases,—a right which the legislature could not take away. Sherwood v. Sherwood, 44 Iowa, 192. We are clear that, on the authorities already cited, and on sound reason and legal principles, chapter 82 of the Laws of 1893 does not confer, or attempt to confer, upon this court, any original jurisdiction; and respondent's motion must be denied.

It is claimed that this question was differently ruled in Klein v. Valerius, 87 Wis. 54, 22 L. R. A. 609. We think the cases clearly distinguishable. The Wisconsin statute there held to be unconstitutional made it the "duty" of the supreme court to review "all questions of law or fact presented upon the record upon such appeal or writ of error." The learned supreme court of Wisconsin condemned the law, and a main reason therefor was that it deprived a party of the constitutional right to the verdict of a jury upon the facts of a law case, and, in effect, abolished the writ of error as it was known at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and which that instrument declared should never be abolished. If there be any language in that opinion that indicates that the views of that court do not correspond with what we have said in this case, we can only say that our great respect for that court causes us to regret that our views are different. And, perhaps,—although we are not clear that such is the case,—our views differ from those expressed by the supreme court of Florida in State, Pleasure, v. McClellan, 25 Fla. 88.

On the merits of the case, the first inquiry that presents itself is this: Are the appellants indorsees in good faith of the note and mortgage which are the subject-matter of the action? We have scrutinized the evidence carefully. Its volume forbids even a synopsis of it. Respondent certainly claims for it all that it tends to fairly support. We quote from the brief of the learned counsel: "The evidence shows that the plaintiffs in this action are grain dealers in Minneapolis, Minnesota, members of the Chamber of Commerce of that city, having offices next door to and adjoining the offices of the payee named in the note. The business relations between the two firms have been intimate for years. They have both been engaged in wheat operations on the floor of the Chamber of Commerce for years. Plaintiffs knew that the mortgage in this case covered all of the elevator property owned by the defendants. They knew enough about the transaction out of which the note and mortgage grew to have an abiding faith at the time of the purchase of the note that it would not be paid. Their object in buying the note and mortgage was not, in the usual course of business, to make an investment in commercial paper, but indirectly to buy the property covered by the mortgage. This note drew only 8 per cent interest; yet the plaintiffs paid $12 more than the amount of the note, with interest to the date of purchase. No inquiries were made relative to the financial standing of the makers of the note; one of the plaintiffs testifying that he did not know, and that he did not care. The express object of the plaintiffs in buying this note and mortgage was to obtain the property mortgaged." Do these facts show that appellants are not protected under the law merchant? The whole basis of respondent's contention rests upon his statement that the notes were not acquired in good faith and in the usual course of business. It is conceded by counsel that suspicious circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry are not in themselves sufficient to overcome the presumption of bona fides in the purchase of commercial paper. Our statute (Rev. Code, § 4884) thus defines an innocent indorsee: "An indorsee in due course is one who in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value, before its apparent maturity or presumptive dishonor, and without knowledge of its actual dishonor, acquires a negotiable instrument duly indorsed to him, or indorsed generally, or payable to the bearer, or one other than the payee, who acquires such an instrument of such an indorsee thereof." What is meant by the "ordinary course of business?" In Kellogg v. Curtis, 69 Me. 212, 31 Am. Rep. 273, the court says: "These words are usually defined to mean 'according to the usages and customs of commercial transactions.'" If the plaintiffs purchased the note before maturity for value, that would be such a transaction. Randolph on Commercial Paper (§ 988) illustrates the meaning of the words by stating what would not be "in the usual course of business"; and from his illustrations it is clear that a note purchased before maturity, for a valuable consideration, and duly indorsed by the payee, and delivered to the purchaser, is taken in the usual course of business. We need not multiply these definitions. Their correctness will not be questioned. What facts are relied upon to take this case out of the rule? It is admitted that the note was purchased before maturity, that full value was paid therefor. Indeed, respondent makes it a matter of complaint that appellants paid slightly more than the amount of the note at the time of the purchase. It is admitted that it was duly indorsed by the payee, and delivered to the purchaser, at the time of the purchase. But it is urged that as both the payee and indorsers of the note were members of the Minneapolis Board of Trade, and their business relations were intimate, therefore the indorsees were charged with notice that the note was given for gambling transactions on the Board of Trade. There is no rule of law that will support any such presumption. Again, it is said that appellants knew when they purchased the note that it would not be paid at maturity, and that their object in making the purchase was to secure the elevators that had been mortgaged to secure the same. Counsel cite us to no case where it has ever been held that the ultimate object of the purchaser of commercial paper in making the purchase could be considered upon the question of his bona fides. In this case, appellants knew that they took the mortgages—the incidents of the debt—as free from all equities as the note itself. See Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, §§ 161 et seq. It would, indeed, be a novel doctrine if the fact that appellants relied upon the security in making the purchase should be held to constitute bad faith on his part; and, knowing the security to be ample, it is not strange that no inquiries were made touching the financial responsibility of the maker.

We reach the conclusion after full consideration of the evidence, that appellants were bona fide indorsees in the usual course of business, and, as such, were entitled to full protection against any equities between the original parties. The appellants are entitled to judgment against the respondent for the full amount of the note in suit, and a decree of foreclosure against the property described in the complaint, with costs of both courts. The district court for Richland County will enter judgment accordingly.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

v.
STATE of Ohio, ex rel. James COOPER.

(.....Ohio.....)

Where by municipal authority a system of sewers is constructed with a view to assessing a portion of the costs thereof equally upon the abutting property, and a portion of the assessments are paid, and a portion successfully resisted, a rule requiring as a condition to the use of the sewer that those who so resisted shall pay a sum equal to that paid by others towards its construction is not unreasonable.

(April 29, 1896.)

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas for Hamilton County to review a judgment awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel defendants to permit plaintiff to tap a sewer in one of the public streets of the city of Cincinnati. Reversed.

Statement by the Court:

In the court of common pleas, a peremptory writ of mandamus was awarded on the petition of Cooper against the board, commanding them to permit him to tap the sewer in Ashland street, upon which his residence fronts, on payment by him of the usual license fee of $5, but without payment of any portion of the cost of constructing the sewer. The material facts are that the city constructed a system of sewers on Walnut Hills, including the Ashland street sewer, at a cost of about $142,000. It made assessments on abutting property to the extent of $2 per front foot, which amounted to about half the cost of construction. Some of the assessments were paid, but a portion of the property owners, including him who was then the owner of Cooper's property, resisted the assessment, upon the ground of fraud by the contractor, and their defense finally prevailed. In consequence thereof, the city was adjudged to pay the balance of the contract price. When Cooper applied to the board for a permit to tap the sewer, it refused to grant it except upon compliance by him with the following rule, which it had previously adopted: "Wherever public sewers have been constructed, and the cost thereof has been wholly or partly paid out of the funds of the city, and the owner of any abutting property makes application for permit to tap such sewer, no permit shall be issued to any such abutting owner, unless he shall have paid the assessment or assessments levied against his said property for the cost of said sewer; or, if for any reason, said assessments have not been paid, or have been released, or no assessment has been levied, no permit shall be granted, unless such person shall first pay into the city treasury, for the purpose of repaying the city the amount paid out or to be paid out by said city on account of said sewers, a sum equal to an amount per front foot to be determined by taking the total cost of constructing the main and lateral sewers and drains into which he desires to tap, and divide the gross amount by the number of front feet abutting upon said sewers; provided, however, that the amount so to be paid shall in no case exceed the sum of $2 per front foot of the property abutting.

Mr. C. J. McDiarmid for defendants in error.

Per Curiam:

The rule adopted by the board of administration is not inconsistent with the judgment that the assessments for the construction of the sewer in question were void. The assessments were asserted against the owners of all abutting property, whether vacant or improved. They were asserted without regard to the use of the sewer. The rule in question prescribes conditions upon which connections may be made for the actual use of the sewer. The board is authorized by § 2402, Rev. Stat. to prescribe rules and regulations for the

NOTE.—The above case briefly disposes of what seems to be a new question respecting sewers by holding a contribution to the expense thereof necessary to the privilege of using a sewer by on who has succeeded in defeating an assessment upon it.

tapping of sewers. Certainly, it may not prescribe an unreasonable rule. In determining whether this rule is reasonable, it is important that the system of sewers of which this is a part was constructed by the city with a view to assessing the cost thereof, within the limit of $2 per foot, upon the abutting property, which, it is admitted, the statute authorized. The rule in question was adopted and properly conditioned to require that those who had not paid assessments should, when desiring to use the sewer, accept an equal burden with those who had. We cannot say that the rule is unreasonable. Its application to this case is obvious.

Mr. George B. Cannon, for plaintiff in error:

If injury to the feelings be an element of actual damages in slander, libel, and breach of promise cases it should equally be so considered in cases of this character. The idea once prevailing that mere nominal damages could be recovered in such cases is now exploded.

Per Curiam:

The plaintiff in error brought suit to recover damages for the negligent failure of the defendant to deliver to him at London, Ohio, a telegram as follows:

Henly, O., Oct. 12, 1890.
To Will Morton, London, Ohio:
Mother dying. Come immediately.
Frank Morton.

He alleges that the sender of the telegram, who was his brother, paid to the company the usual rates; that it negligently failed to deliver the message to him, whereby he was "left in total ignorance of his mother's illness, and was deprived of the solace and comfort of attending her in her last sickness, and of the privilege of attending her funeral, which he could and would have done but for the default of the defendant, its agents, and employees, and that he was injured in his feelings and affections thereby in the sum of $5,000." A demurrer to the petition was sustained in the court of common pleas, and that judgment was affirmed by the circuit court.

The judgment rests upon the elementary

v.
Imeda OLINGER.

(--------Ohio--------)

*1. One who collects on his own premises a substance liable to escape, and, if it should escape, likely to cause mischief, must at least use reasonable care to restrain it. If for want of such care it escapes and injures persons or property rightfully on adjoining premises, he is answerable for the damages sustained on account thereof.

2. Where such dangerous substances and a dwelling house are both situated on the same parcel of land, and subject to the same general ownership, the dwelling house should be regarded, in this connection, as situated on adjoining premises, if it is in the possession of and occupied as a family residence by a tenant, even if such tenancy be at will only, by a servant of such owner, and his occupancy is without a fixed rental, but is part of the compensation paid for his services, and such services are performed in or about the business with which such dangerous substance is connected.

3. A guest, by the express or implied invitation of such tenant, is rightfully at his residence; and if, while there as such guest, such dangerous substance so collected on the adjoining premises escapes by the fault of the person who collected it, and injures her person, she may maintain an action against him to recover damages sustained on account thereof.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Defiance County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Bradbury, J.:

Almeda Olinger, defendant in error, brought an action in the court of common pleas of Defiance county, against the Defiance Water Company, plaintiff in error, to recover on account of injuries she claims to have received by reason of the negligent manner in which the water company stored water on its own premises. A demurrer to the petition was sustained by the court of common pleas. The cause was then taken to the circuit court on error, where the petition was held to be sufficient, and the judgment of the court of common pleas reversed. Thereupon a petition in error was filed in his court by the waterworks company, seeking to reverse the judgment of the circuit court and affirm that of the court of common pleas.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decision of this case depends upon the nature of the liability incurred by one who collects and maintains upon his premises a substance liable to escape and injure others. The petition discloses that the water company had erected on its own premises a large iron tank, or standpipe, about 20 feet in diameter and 140 feet high, which it maintained full of water, for the purpose of supplying its customers, the city of Defiance and its inhabitants; that it owned a dwelling house, situated within 50 yards of the standpipe, which was occupied by one John Gillum as a residence, who is conceded to have been a servant of the water company; that the defendant in error was the mother-in-law of said Gillum, and on the day of the accident was at said dwelling house as his invited guest; that the standpipe had been negligently constructed, and, prior to the accident, had become cracked and weakened, to the knowledge of the waterworks company; that they negligently permitted ice to form, and sand, earth, and dirt to accumulate therein; and that, by reason of its defective construction, this accumulation of ice, sand, etc., and its cracked and weakened condition, so negligently permitted, the standpipe fell, whereby the water escaped therefrom with such force as to crush said residence, and overwhelm the defendant in error, causing the injuries to her person of which she complained. That the fall of the standpipe and the resulting rush of its waters, by which the defendant in error was overwhelmed and injured, were due to the negligence of the plaintiff in error, is admitted by the demurrer to the petition. She was at the dwelling house of her son-in-law, as the guest of himself or family, as she had a lawful right to be, and, while such guest, without the slightest fault chargeable to her in connection with the accident, sustained injuries attributive solely to the wrongful conduct of the plaintiff in error. If, under these circumstances, she cannot recover for those injuries, it is because the plaintiff in error owed no duty to her in this connection.

The terms, as to rent or otherwise, upon which the dwelling house was occupied, do not appear. Gillum, the servant of the company, may have been a mere tenant at will, occupying it as part of the consideration he was receiving for his services, the latter being determinable at the pleasure of either party. Whether this supposition accords with the facts, or whether he was occupying it for a definite period at a fixed rental, is not material. In either case it was in his possession, and occupied by him as a family residence. Whatever might be the character or duration of his title, it was within the principle of those rules of law which protect a proprietor against injuries caused by acts committed on adjoining premises. His rights may not have been as extensive and valuable as those an owner in fee would have had, but such rights as he possessed were entitled to protection. These protective principles enfold persons and personal property, as well as real estate. To collect and maintain upon one's premises substances likely to do mischief if they escape menaces persons and personal property in the vicinity equally with the real estate; and such persons or personal property, when rightfully there, should be equally protected. The defendant in error was the guest of the occupant of the dwelling house. It was his privilege to expressly or impliedly invite her, and she had a right to accept the invitation. Being rightfully there, as the guest of the occupant of the dwelling house that was overwhelmed by the escaping water, we think her rights in this connection equal to his rights.

This brings us to the consideration of the question of the liability of one who, for his own purposes, collects upon his premises a substance likely to injure others in case it escapes. The principle upon which liability rests in such case is quite unlike that which determines the liability of one who leaves unguarded excavations upon his own lands, or one who negligently constructs a building so that it falls upon his own premises. In these latter cases no one can be injured unless he comes upon the premises. If he remains away, he is safe. In the former, the danger arises from the natural tendency of the things to escape from the premises where stored, together with the likelihood of its doing injury if it does escape therefrom. In England it seems to be settled, by Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, that the duty rests upon one who collects and stores upon his premises inanimate substances or animate things from the escape of which injury is likely to follow, to prevent such escape. While this duty may not extend to trespassers, or those who, for their own purposes, without express or implied invitation from the proprietor, choose to come upon the premises, yet that case (Fletcher v. Rylands, supra) should be regarded as extending this duty to all persons who may be rightfully on adjoining premises. Blackburn, J., in the course of an able opinion, and speaking for the whole court, used the following language: "We think that the true rule of law is that the person who for his own purposes brings on his lands, and collects and keeps there, anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by showing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default; or perhaps that the escape was the consequence of a vis major, or the act of God. . . . The general rule, as above stated, seems, on principle, just. The person whose grass or corn is eaten down by the escaping cattle of his neighbor, or whose mine is flooded by the water from his neighbor's reservoir, or whose cellar is invaded by the filth of his neighbor's privy, or whose habitation is made unhealthy by the fumes and noisome vapors of his neighbor's alkali works, is damnified without any fault of his own; and it seems but reasonable and just that the neighbor, who has brought something on his own property which was not natural there, harmless to others so long as it is confined to his own property, but which he knows to be mischievous if it gets on his neighbor's should be obliged to make good the damage which ensues if he does not succeed in confining it to his own property. But for his act in bringing it there no mischief could have accrued, and it seems but just that he should at his peril keep it there so that no mischief may accrue, or answer for the natural or anticipated consequences. And upon authority, this, we think, is established to be the law, whether the things so brought be beasts, or water, or filth, or stenches."

This doctrine would seem to be in exact accord with justice and sound reason, but in the case before us we are not required to apply it to its full extent, because the defendant in error, in her amended petition, expressly avers negligence in the construction of the standpipe, as well as a knowledge that it had afterwards cracked and become weakened, a negligent failure to make repairs, and that the accident which caused her injuries was the direct result of such negligence. Therefore, whether or not she could recover, in the absence of negligence on the part of the water company in storing the water, does not concern us at this time, for, however that may be, certainly one who, like defendant in error, is rightfully on premises adjoining those upon which such substances are stored, and is injured by their escape, should, upon the plainest principle of natural justice, recover from the proprietor storing the same damages for such injury, where the escape was caused by negligence.

Judgment affirmed.

Burket, J., dissenting:

As I read the petition, the house at which plaintiff below was visiting was on the same premises as the standpipe, and was a part of said premises, and was not on adjoining premises, and therefore the water company owed no duty to her, and, when she went upon the premises without the invitation of the company, she went at her own peril. There is no rule of law warranting the placing of the house by construction on adjoining premises when it in fact stands upon the premises of the water-works company.

"An Act to Regulate the Sale and Gift of Opium, Morphine, Engshe or Cooked Opium, Hydrate of Chloral or Cocaine," approved February 21, 1887 (Laws 1887, p. 87). The 1st section of this act provides that "no person shall have in his or her possession, or offer for sale," any of the drugs enumerated in the title "who has not previously obtained a license from the county clerk of the county in which he or she resides or does business." Sections from 2-6 inclusive provide the form of the license; that it shall be issued only to regularly qualified physicians who keep a stock of drugs and medicines for their own use in prescription, and regularly qualified druggists; prohibits the sale and gift of any of the enumerated drugs to any person except on the prescription of a physician or regularly qualified pharmacist, and then only of the kind and quantity therein named; provides that none but physicians and pharmacists who have duly registered as required by the act shall be authorized to prescribe the use of any of such drugs, and then only for the cure of disease, and in such cases and quantities as are recognized by medical science as proper and fit. Section 7 requires physicians and pharmacists who have prescribed any of said drugs to keep a record thereof, which shall be open to public inspection, showing the date of the prescription, the name and residence of the patient, the disease for which it was prescribed, and how much and how often the patient was instructed to use the same. Section 8 defines who shall be deemed physicians and pharmacists within the meaning of the act. Section 9 provides the penalty for its violation, and section 10 gives the justice's court jurisdiction of offenses described therein. The petitioner claims that he is illegally restrained of his liberty, because (1) the act of 1887 does not intend to make the possession of opium a crime unless it is kept for sale or gift; and (2) if it does, it infringes upon the fundamental rights of liberty and property, and is therefore void.

That the act with which the defendant was charged, viz., having in his possession opium without either a license therefor or it having been obtained on the prescription of a physician or pharmacist for medicinal purposes, is within the restraint of the statute, there can be no doubt. The act provides, in plain and unambiguous language, that no person shall have in his or her possession opium who has not previously obtained a license therefor, unless, as the law clearly implies, it be obtained on the prescription of some duly qualified physician or pharmacist for medicinal purposes. Its evident purpose and object is to regulate the sale and traffic in opium and the other enumerated poisonous drugs so as to prevent a prevalent evil by confining their use to strictly medicinal purposes, and to that end it prohibits any person except licensed physicians and druggists from having such drugs in his or her possession unless obtained for medicinal purposes in the manner provided in the act; and such provision is clearly germane to and within the subject of the act as expressed in the title. Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 64; State v. Shaw, 22 Or. 287.

Nor do we think the act, as so interpreted, unconstitutional, as being an infringement on the rights of liberty and property as guaranteed by the fundamental law. Opium is an active poison, and has no legitimate use except for medicinal purposes; but it is frequently used to produce a kind of intoxication by smoking or eating, a loathsome, disgusting, and degrading practice, which results not only in pauperism and crime, but also in the serious impairment of the mental and physical condition of those who indulge in it. The sale and disposition of such a drug may unquestionably be regulated and controlled by law, and whether its nature and character are such that, for the protection of the public, its possession by unauthorized persons should be prohibited, is a question of fact and of public policy, which belongs to the legislative department to determine. The discretion of the legislature in the employment of means which are reasonably calculated to protect the health, morals, or safety of the public is very great; and so long as it does not infringe upon the inherent rights of life, liberty, and property, either directly or through some limitations upon the means of living or some material right essential to the enjoyment of life, its determination is conclusive upon the courts. And while the state cannot assume to be the guardian of morals, it has the undoubted power to enact measures calculated for the suppression of such forms of vice as threaten its welfare by generating disease, pauperism, and crime; and primarily, it is for the legislature to determine what laws and regulations are needful for that purpose. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253. Of course this power must be so exercised as not to arbitrarily infringe upon personal and property rights, but "in many cases of mere administration the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion or by means of the suffrage." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 370, 30 L. ed. 226. To this last class, in our opinion, belongs the case before us. The act does not forbid the possession or prohibit the sale of opium, but allows both under such regulations and conditions as will, it is believed, tend to prevent its harmful and improper use. No right secured by the fundamental law is interfered with or impaired by this legislation, because the possession and use of the drugs are not restrained thereby, so as to destroy its value as a remedial agent,—its only recognized legitimate use. Its object and purpose is to so regulate the possession, sale, and disposition of a dangerous yet useful drug as to prevent the weak and unwary from using it to their own physical and mental ruin, and to the serious injury of the general public; and in our opinion, violates no constitutional right. State v. Ah Chew, 16 Nev. 50, 40 Am. Rep. 488; Ex parte Yung Jon, 28 Fed. Rep. 308; Ah Lim v. Territory, 1 Wash. 156, 9 L. R. A. 395; Davis v. State, 68 Ala. 58, 44 Am. Rep. 128; State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100. We are not unmindful of the fact that some courts have held that the legislature cannot make it a crime to have in one's possession intoxicating liquors, although it may regulate, or even prohibit, the sale and disposition thereof. State v. Gilman, 33 W. Va. 146, 6 L. R. A. 847; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 68. But the principle of these cases has no application here. It is a matter of common knowledge that intoxicating liquors are produced principally for sale and consumption as a beverage, and so common has been their manufacture and use for this purpose that they are regarded by some courts as legitimate articles of property, the possession of which neither produces nor threatens any harm to the public. But the use of opium for any purpose other than as permitted in this act has no place in the common experience or habits of the people of this country, but is admitted by all to be an insidious and demoralizing vice, injurious alike to the health, morals, and welfare of the public; and therefore its possession, unless in the manner provided by the legislature for the purposes stated, cannot be presumed to be of any value to its owner except on the hypothesis that he intends to make a use of it injurious to himself and the general public, and hence it is within the legitimate exercise of the police power of the state to regulate its sale, and confine its possession to certain designated persons, as a means of public safety. It follows that the judgment of the court below is right, and must be affirmed.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Town of BRISTOL
v.
BRISTOL & WARREN WATERWORKS
et al.

(.....R. I.....)

1. One against whom no relief is sought except that he be ordered to convey certain property which the bill shows that he has already conveyed is not a proper party to the bill.
2. A contract between a town and a waterworks company for the purchase by the town of the waterworks at a price to be mutually agreed upon, or, on failure to agree, to be fixed by arbitrators, will be enforced by the court if the waterworks company refuses to agree or to appoint arbitrators; where the agreement to purchase is merely a part of another more extensive contract under which the parties have incurred obligations so that they cannot be placed in statu quo.
3. The failure to appoint an arbitrator under an agreement for arbitration cannot be objected to by another party who has expressly given notice of a refusal to comply with the contract for arbitration.
4. An averment in a bill that plaintiff is ready and willing or able to pay the price to be fixed by arbitrators is not necessary in a bill framed upon the theory that the time for arbitration has passed because the respondent has refused arbitration.
5. The objection that a town has not power to purchase waterworks cannot be made by the owner of the works in order to defeat its contract with the town for the sale thereof.

ON DEMURRER by defendant to a bill to compel it to comply with its agreement to sell its plant to plaintiff. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Benjamin M. Bosworth and Arnold Green, for respondents, in support of demurrer:

The respondent company is affected with knowledge of the limitations of the complainant's powers and the powers of the complainant's committee.

Austin v. Coggeshall, 12 R. I. 329, 34 Am. Rep. 648; Farnsworth v. Pawtucket, 13 R. I. 82.

The complainant has no power to purchase or to pay for the waterworks, or to hold or to manage the same, except as given by chap. 1430 of the Public Laws, passed May 23, 1895. This act limits the amount to be borrowed to $200,000, and this sum is to cover several items of expenditure, only one of which is the purchase of the waterworks; it also contains a provision by which the complainant town cannot issue any bonds, however small in amount, without action by the electors in town meeting. The act confers limited powers, but it creates no liability or responsibility.

The power of a municipality to tax must emanate from the legislature. The power is to be strictly construed, and doubts resolved in favor of the public and against the power.

The complainant cannot enter into an arbitration mutually binding.

Should the arbitrators name a purchase price sufficiently less than $200,000, the complainant would possess power to claim a conveyance and title. Should the arbitrators name a purchase price of more than $200,000, the complainant must rejoin. Our powers are limited.

Messrs. Comstock & Gardner, for plaintiff:

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The substantial allegations of the bill, in so far as the same are material to the questions raised by the demurrer, are as follows, viz.: (1) That on the 30th day of January, 1882, the town of Bristol entered into a contract with the respondent George H. Norman for the construction of a system of waterworks for supplying pure water to said town. (2) That by said contract said town granted to said Norman, his successors and assigns, the exclusive right and use of the public streets, squares, and lanes of said town for the purpose of laying water pipes, and of continuing the same therein, and selling water, for the period of fifty years from and after the date of said contract, or until the town should avail itself of the option of purchase reserved to it in said contract; said town agreeing to pay to said Norman, his successors and assigns, the sum of $3,000 each year for the use of hydrants and the water required for fire purposes in said town, and, in addition thereto, a sum each year equal to the amount of all the taxes assessed in said town by said town or the state of Rhode Island on said waterworks, for a supply of water for the Rogers Free Library, the public schools, town house, town hall, fire-engine house, hook and ladder house, police station, and four drinking fountains; and that said Norman, in considera tion thereof, agreed to construct a complete waterworks for the supply of said town for the purpose of domestic, manufacturing, and other uses, to lay pipes in all the streets in the compact part of the town, and connect fire hydrants with said pipes, and to at all times maintain a head of water not less than 125 feet above high tide; and also to furnish certain drinking fountains, and at all times maintain an ample supply of water for domestic and manufacturing purposes, at rates not higher than charged for the same at Newport, R. I. It was further provided in said contract, and as a part of the consideration for the privileges, grants, and payments aforesaid, that said town of Bristol might, at its option, purchase said waterworks and all pipes, reservoirs, pumps, and other property, rights, and appurtenances connected with said works, at any time after ten years and within fifteen years from the date of said contract, for a fair and reasonable price, to be agreed upon by said town on the one part and said Norman, his successors or assigns, on the other part, or fixed by a majority of arbitrators appointed for the purpose, one by said town, one by said Norman or his representative, and the third by the two so chosen. (3) That, shortly after the making of said contract, said Norman made and entered into another contract with the town of Warren for the construction of waterworks for the supplying of that town with water, and that, after the making of said contracts with said towns of Bristol and Warren, said Norman proceeded to construct a single system of waterworks for the supplying of water to both said towns; and that from thence hitherto he has supplied said town of Bristol and the inhabitants thereof with water, and has received payment therefor, in accordance with the terms of said contract. (4) That, soon after the completion of said system of waterworks, said Norman conveyed the same, and all his right, title, and interest therein, to the Bristol & Warren Waterworks, a corporation created by the general assembly, by deed duly recorded in said towns of Warren and Bristol. (5) That the qualified electors of said town of Bristol, at a meeting duly called and held after the expiration of ten years and within fifteen years from the date of said contract between the town of Bristol and said Norman, passed a vote whereby it voted to purchase of the Bristol & Warren Waterworks the said waterworks and other property, rights, and appurtenances belonging thereto, in accordance with the option aforesaid, and appointed a committee of said town, with authority to agree with said company upon a fair and reasonable price for such waterworks, and, in default of such agreement, to appoint an arbitrator in behalf of said town, in accordance with the terms of said contract, and to take such legal and other proceedings as might be necessary to procure for said town of Bristol the title to said waterworks; and that said committee, immediately after its appointment, notified said Bristol & Warren Waterworks of the aforesaid action of said town, and requested said corporation to agree with them, as representing said town, upon a fair and reasonable price to be paid for said waterworks, and also gave such notice and made such request to said respondent George H. Norman; but that he and the Bristol & Warren Waterworks expressly refused, and still refuse, to attempt to agree with said town upon a fair and reasonable price to be paid for such waterworks, and refuse to appoint an arbitrator to determine a price to be paid for such waterworks, in accordance with the terms of said contract, and also refuse to convey said waterworks to said town of Bristol. (6) That unless the complainant shall be enabled to purchase said system of waterworks said Norman and said waterworks company and its assigns will, in accordance with the terms of said contract, continue to have and enjoy the exclusive right and privilege of maintaining a system of waterworks in said town of Bristol for the term of fifty years, as aforesaid, notwithstanding the vote of said town to purchase the same, and in violation of the conditions of said contract. The prayer of the bill is that it may be ascertained, by reference to a master, or in such other manner as the court may deem proper, how much and what part of said waterworks system the said respondents, or either of them, can convey to the complainant for use in connection with a system of waterworks for said town of Bristol, and how much and what part of the same it is incumbent upon the complainant to purchase and pay for, and also what is a fair and reasonable price to be paid for the same; and that said respondents, either or both of them, as the court may determine to be proper and necessary, may be ordered by decree of the court to convey to the complainant said waterworks, or such part thereof as it may be found that they, or either of them, are able to convey and should so convey, upon payment by the complainant of such fair and reasonable price as may be determined, which price the complainant is ready and willing and offers to pay; and for other relief.

To this bill of complaint the respondents respectively have demurred. The ground upon which the respondent Norman bases his demurrer is that it appears that, previous to the bringing of the bill in this cause, he had conveyed all his right, title, and interest in said system of waterworks to the Bristol & Warren Waterworks, a corporation created by the legislative assembly of the state of Rhode Island, by deed duly recorded in the towns of Warren & Bristol, and in Bristol county, in the state of Massachusetts, and hence that he has no interest in the subject-matter of the suit which can make him liable to the claims of the complainant, as set forth in the bill. We think this demurrer must be sustained. The bill seeks for no relief against the respondent Norman except that he be ordered to make conveyance of said waterworks; and as it appears that he has already sold and conveyed all his right, title, and interest therein to said Bristol & Warren Waterworks, he is, of course, unable to convey the same to complainant, and hence is not a necessary or proper party to the bill.

The demurrer of the Bristol & Warren Waterworks is based upon the grounds: (1) That the contract is one to convey, at a price to be agreed upon, or to be fixed by arbitrators; (2) that for such price the court cannot substitute a price to be fixed by itself directly, or through the agency of a master; (3) that said bill of complaint contains no averment that the complainant has appointed the arbitrator provided for in said contract to be appointed by itself; (4) that said bill of complaint contains no averment that the complainant has appointed the arbitrator provided for in said contract, and has communicated such appointment to this respondent; and (5) that said bill of complaint contains no averment that said complainant is ready and willing, or is ready or is willing or is able to pay the price which may be fixed by the arbitrators provided for in said contract, or that it has the legal power, either by loan or by taxation, to raise the amount of the price so to be fixed by said arbitrators.

The first and second grounds of said demurrer may properly be considered together. The case which the record presents is this: The town of Bristol had the right, under the contract aforesaid, to purchase the waterworks in question, at a price to be mutually agreed upon by the parties thereto, or, in case of a failure so to agree, to have the price fixed by arbitrators, chosen as aforesaid. It has elected to exercise said right. The Bristol & Warren Waterworks, which confessedly stands, so far as said contract is concerned, in the shoes of said Norman, with the same rights and liabilities which appertained to him, has refused either to agree upon a price for said waterworks or to appoint arbitrators to fix the same. In other words, it has deliberately violated the express terms of said contract in this regard; and it is suggested that, unless this court has jurisdiction to either compel a specific performance thereof or to grant the relief prayed for, said waterworks company may continue to hold said property, and enjoy the privileges and immunities secured by said contract, for the remainder of the term of fifty years, in continual violation of said contract. But, however this may be, we think there is no doubt as to the jurisdiction of this court to grant the relief prayed for. Said company having failed to comply with the terms of said contract in the particulars aforesaid, this court clearly has the authority to provide some means for the fixing of the price at which said waterworks shall be conveyed to said town, and to order such conveyance; and we think that the regular and proper mode to accomplish this object is by first referring the case to a master, to ascertain and determine the price at which said works shall be conveyed. If the case was that of a simple agreement or contract for the sale of land or other property at a price to be fixed by arbitrators, where one of the parties had refused to appoint an arbitrator, the court probably could not, upon the application of the other party, either fix a price itself or appoint arbitrators, for the reason suggested in the demurrer, viz., that the contract, being simply for a sale at a price to be fixed in a certain manner, the parties could not be compelled either to sell or to buy at a price not so fixed. Such is the English doctrine. Milnes v. Gery, 14 Ves. Jr. 400; Wilks v. Davis, 3 Meriv. 507; Vickers v. Vickers, L. R. 4 Eq. 529. The same rule has been followed in this country when there have been no circumstances to distinguish the case from Milnes v. Gery, Pom. Spec. Perf. Cont. § 150.

The cases of Providence v. St. John's Lodge, 2 R. I. 46, and Dike v. Greene, 4 R. I. 285, would seem at first blush to establish a different rule. But in these cases the contract was to sell at a price to be fixed by appraisement, with no stipulation as to how the appraisers should be appointed. The court held in these circumstances that it could itself appoint a master to make the appraisal, and would decree a specific performance at the price so determined. But, as well stated by complainant's counsel, where the contract to sell does not stand alone, but is merely a subsidiary part of another contract for a more extensive purpose, the performance of which has already been entered upon, a different rule prevails. In such a case the courts hold that the manner of determining the price is a matter of form, rather than of substance; and if it becomes evident that it cannot be determined in the manner provided for in the contract, by reason of the refusal of one party to do what in equity he ought to do, the court will determine it upon the application of the other. Coles v. Peck, 96 Ind. 333, 49 Am. Rep. 161. In other words, if the parties have incurred obligations under the contract so that they cannot be placed in statu quo, the court will itself enforce the agreement. Tscheider v. Biddle, 4 Dill. 55, Fed. Cas. No. 14,210; Herrman v. Babcock, 103 Ind. 461; Lowe v. Brown, 22 Ohio St 463; Biddle v. Ramsey, 52 Mo. 153. See also Morse, Arbitration & Award, 94; Pom. Spec. Perf. Cont. §§ 148–151; Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 44; Flint v. Pearce, 11 R. I. 576. Pom. Spec. Perf. Cont. § 151, states the law applicable to this class of contracts as follows: "The second class embraces those contracts in which a mode for ascertaining the price is mentioned, but from the language of the stipulation it is regarded as nonessential, and as something rather by way of suggestion, so that the agreement itself is virtually one to sell for a fair price. In such a case if the means specified for fixing upon the price fail for any reason, the court does not treat the contract as fatally defective; but will, in the suit for a specific performance, direct a fair and reasonable price to be ascertained in some manner preliminary to the decree, either by referring the matter to a master or other officer, or by appointing a skilled person as a special valuer, or even by determining the amount itself; it will pursue any such mode as the circumstances of the case show to be expedient. The tendency of the later English decisions is to consider these stipulations for a determination of the price by a third person, rather as a matter of form than of substance; to construe them in such manner that they become incidental only to the main object of the agreement. The court will always look at the substance of the agreement, and disregard the mere forms which had been provided for effectuating it, and which cannot be made operative." See cases cited in note 1, p. 214. In other words, "equity regards not the form but the real nature of the transaction." Thompson v. Taylor, 12 R. I. 111. The case before us is a typical one for the application of this doctrine. The agreement to sell is clearly a subsidiary part of a much more extensive contract,—a contract by virtue of which the respondent has for nearly fifteen years enjoyed exclusive privileges in the highways of said town, and collected large sums of money from the town and its inhabitants, and by virtue of which it may continue, unless said sale can be consummated, or other relief be granted, to enjoy the same exclusive and valuable franchise for the remainder of said term of years. Nor can the complainant, by any possibility, be put in the position in which it was before the contract was executed.

As to the third and fourth grounds of demurrer, viz., that the bill contains no averment that said complainant has appointed the arbitrator provided for in said contract to be appointed by itself, and that it contains no averment that the complainant has communicated such appointment to the respondent, we need only say that the case shows that the respondent, in reply to a written request from a committee duly appointed by and representing the town of Bristol to arrange with said water company as to a fair and reasonable price to be paid for said waterworks, in accordance with the contract aforesaid, expressly declined to name a price for which it would sell said waterworks to said town, and also declined to appoint an arbitrator to meet the arbitrator from said town to determine upon a fair and reasonable price for said waterworks. In other words, the bill alleges facts which excuse the appointment of an arbitrator by the town, viz., the positive and distinct refusal of the respondent to appoint an arbitrator on its part. And it is clear that the respondent cannot be heard to object that the complainant did not make an appointment after it had expressly notified said complainant that it refused to comply with the terms of said contract in this regard. The law does not require the performance of an utterly useless or futile act.

As to the fifth ground of demurrer,—viz., that the bill contains no averment that the complainant is ready and willing or is able to pay the price which may be fixed by the arbitrators, or that it has the legal power, either by loan or by taxation, to raise the amount of the price so to be fixed by said arbitrators,—we have to say that, as to the first part thereof, we do not see that any such averment is necessary. The bill is framed upon the theory that the time for arbitration has already passed. The respondent, as before stated, has expressly refused either to name a price or to submit the fixing thereof to arbitrators, as provided in the contract. That the complainant was so ready and willing before the respondent refused to arbitrate appears from its vote to purchase, under the conditions of the contract which required it to pay the price fixed by arbitration, and by the action of its committee as aforesaid; and it avers that it is now ready and willing to pay the price which shall be determined under the direction of the court. We fail to see that the complainant is in any default whatsoever in the premises, or that it can properly be called upon to do anything more than it has already done in order to entitle it to the relief prayed for.

As to the objection that the bill contains no averment that the complainant has the legal power to raise the amount of the price to be fixed, we think it clear that no such averment is necessary. The contract provides that the town may purchase; and the respondent cannot be permitted to set up, as an excuse for its refusal to carry out said contract, that the town has not the power to purchase. It cannot treat a part thereof as binding, and reject the rest. In short having entered into said contract, the respondent is estopped from denying that the town had authority to make the same. See Herman, Estoppel, §§ 749, 764, 800, and cases cited. Moreover the mere fixing of the price to be paid for said waterworks will not devest the respondent of its property therein, or in any way prejudice its rights in connection therewith. It will simply be a step in the direction of carrying out the contract of purchase. But not until the price which shall be fixed shall have been paid by the complainant will the property rights of the respective parties be other or different from what they now are. We are therefore of the opinion that the demurrer of said waterworks company is not well founded, and that the same should be overruled.

I. Tenants for life strictly.

a. General rule as to taxes.

In Gross v. Taylor, 81 Ga. 86, 88, it was stated that the property must pay the taxes, and parties interested must see that they are paid in order to protect such reversionary or other interests as they may have therein.

The doctrine is that it is the duty of a tenant for life to pay all the ordinary taxes assessed and accruing during his tenancy. Prettyman v. Walston, 34 Ill. 175, 191; Stansbury v. Inglebart, 9 Mackey, 134; McCook v. Harp, 81 Ga. 229; Austell v. Swann, 74 Ga. 278; Chaplin v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 231, 233.

It is well settled that the burden of paying current taxes is upon the tenant for life rather than upon the remainderman. Hagan v. Varney, 147 Ill. 281, 292; Clark v. Middlesworth, 82 Ind. 240; Olleman v. Kelgore, 52 Iowa, 38; Menger v. Carruthers (Kan.) 44 Pac. 1096; Fox v. Long, 8 Bush, 551, 554; Stetson v. Day, 51 Me. 434; Varney v. Sherwood, 4 Blatchf. 112; Pike v. Wassell, 94 U.S. 711, 24 L. ed. 307.

One in possession or having the ownership of real estate must pay the taxes, assessed on the value of such land, no matter whether his ownership be that of the fee, or of a mere life estate. Arnold v. Smith, 3 Bush, 163; Dubois v. Campau, 24 Mich. 360; Lacey v. Davis, 4 Mich. 140, 66 Am. Dec. 524.

And if he is the owner or possessor of a portion of the whole property he must pay the taxes on such portion. Johnson v. Smith, 5 Bush, 102, 104.

The owner or possessor of an interest in a tract of land or a lot in a town or city must pay the taxes, and if he is not the owner and possessor of the whole tract or the whole lot he must pay the taxes on the interest or share which he does own in it, and the words "owner or possessor" are used as precautionary to embrace both classes, and thereby the better to secure the payment of the taxes assessed. So held in Johnson v. Smith, 5 Bush, 102, decided under Ky. Rev. Stat. chap. 83, art. 3, § 2, art. 6, § 12.

So, a tenant in common for life of one third of real estate is bound to pay one third of the taxes not a devisee of a life estate in remainder after a prior life estate, who purchased at tax sales caused by default of the first life tenant and entered into possession after the latter's death, had accepted or renounced the devise.

Under How. Anno. Stat. § 5544, after the death of Henry Casler his children and their representatives were entitled to an absolute title in fee of the land in question.

Fraser v. Chene, 2 Mich. 81; Case v. Green, 78 Mich. 540; Martin v. Cook, 102 Mich. 267.

The court committed no error in striking from the record the evidence of Mr. Hartwell.

Bailey v. Bailey, 25 Mich. 188; Jones v. Jones, Id. 401; Tuxbury v. French, 41 Mich. 12; Tewksbury v. French, 44 Mich. 100; Ireland v. Parmenter, 48 Mich. 631; Toms v. Williams, 41 Mich. 565; Eyer v. Beck, 70 Mich. 179.

Where there is no ambiguity on the face of a will none can be raised by extrinsic evidence.

Kinney v. Kinney, 34 Mich. 250; Forbes v. Darling, 94 Mich. 621.

Oral evidence cannot be received to explain the intent, except as it may bring before the court such circumstances surrounding the making of the will as may be necessary to an understanding of the terms employed.

Waldron v. Waldron, 45 Mich. 353; Tuxbury v. French, 41 Mich. 7; Ford v. Ford, 80 Mich. 42; Byrne v. Hume, 84 Mich. 185.

In construing a will the plain intention of the testator as evidenced by the language of the will must prevail, and such intent must be gathered from all the parts of the instrument.

Wales v. Templeton, 83 Mich. 177; Stebbins v. Stebbins, 86 Mich. 474.

It is the duty of a tenant for life to pay the taxes assessed upon the property and to make repairs in order to prevent waste.

Smith v. Blindbury, 66 Mich. 323; Jenks v. Horton, 96 Mich. 13; Watkins v. Green, 101 Mich. 493.

And if a life tenant should fail and neglect to pay the taxes assessed against the land in which he has an interest, and the second life-estate man should bid it in at a tax sale, it would amount to nothing more than a payment of the taxes so far as the remaindermen would be concerned.

Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 500-509.

This whole subject relative to the rights acquired by Henry Casler by the purchase of the land at tax sale before mentioned is foreclosed against him by—assessed thereon. Anderson v. Greble, 1 Ashm. 136.

He must protect the interests of the remainderman. Watkins v. Green, 101 Mich. 493, 498.

It is the duty of the tenant for life to pay the taxes, and by a discharge of such duties he can acquire no rights u der the statute of limitations. Higgins v. Crosby, 40 Ill. 262, 263.

And this is so for the reason that he enjoys the use of the property, its income, etc., free of rent, and therefore he should pay the taxes and keep the property improved. Creutz v. Heil, 89 Ky. 429; Holcombe v. Holcombe, 29 N. J. Eq. 597.

And for the further reason that the burden is incident to the present use and enjoyment thereof. Waldo v. Cummings, 45 Ill. 421, 425.

He must transmit the estate as he received it. Holcombe v. Holcombe, supra.

By neglect of such duty he commits a wrong against the reversioner. Varney v. Stevens, 22 Me. 331, 334.

But the burdens assumed with the enjoyment of the life estate relate to the future only. Harrison v. Peck, 56 Barb. 251, 265.

A tenant for life of real estate must pay the taxes if there is any income to pay them with. Newby v. Brownlee, 23 Fed. Rep. 320; Peirce v. Burroughs, 58 N. H. 302.

And it is the duty of one entitled in remainder, who brings suit against a tenant for life for damages occasioned by the failure of the latter to pay taxes, to prove that the income of the estate was sufficient, to compel the tenant for life to pay the same. Clark v. Middlesworth, 82 Ind. 240.

The liability of a tenant for life to keep down taxes is limited to the rental value of the premises, but the rents of the whole term of his estate are answerable for the payment of taxes accruing during such term. Murch v. J. O. Smith Mfg. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 193.

And a discount received by a tenant for life for the prompt payment of taxes will not be allowed in accounting for the same. Barnum v. Barnum, 42 Md. 255.

In Roche v. Waters, 72 Md. 264, 7 L. R. A. 533, it was held that taxes upon city property and assessments thereon for street improvements must be paid by the life tenant, and that he could not compel the remaindermen to contribute toward such payment.

So, where a reversioner covenanted in a mortgage of his reversionary interest to pay the taxes assessed upon the land, it was held that the life tenant was not relieved from his obligation. Jenks v. Horton, 96 Mich. 13, 15.

And a purchaser of a reversion, either by way of mortgage or absolute conveyance, is subrogated to all the rights of the original reversioner as against the tenant for life, including the right to compel the life tenant to pay the taxes. Ibid.

A tenant for life has the right to cut down the timber upon the estate in such quantity and at such locations as will not impair the value of the inheritance, where the cutting is done in order to redeem the land and pay the taxes. Cannon v. Barry, 59 Miss. 290.

But in an action against a tenant for life to recover damages for waste, it was held that a claim made by the defendant that he was required to sell the growing timber to provide funds for the payment of current taxes could not be sustained for the reason, inter alia, that as between such tenant for life and the remaindermen, it was the former's duty to pay the taxes. Disher v. Disher, 45 Neb. 100.

The obligation of the tenant for life does not rest in covenant express or implied, but in equity as an incident to the estate, and therefore, where one contracts for a life estate he must be supposed to contract with reference to the incidents thereto attached, and the reservation of rent does not change the nature of the estate, or create an equity

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One Peter Casler, being owner in fee of the premises in controversy, made a will which contained the following provisions: "I give and bequeath to my wife, Betsey Casler, all the west half of the southeast quarter, and the south half of the east half of the southeast quarter, except so much of said land on the south as will make 40 acres, on section 31, according to the original survey of the United States, being in the township of Shiawassee, county of Shiawassee and state of Michigan, it being the same farm on which I now reside. After her decease the said real estate above described I give and bequeath to Henry Casler, my son, and after his decease said real estate to belong to his heirs." It appears that, during the time that Betsey Casler occupied the land, it was assessed for taxes to her for the years 1874 and 1875. It was sold for these taxes, and tax deeds were executed to Henry Casler on December 9, 1876, and December 13, 1877. After the testator's death his widow, Betsey Casler, entered and occupied the premises until her death, which occurred in September, 1877. Afterwards Henry Casler entered and held possession until November 7, 1879, when he conveyed the premises to John L. Lake by warranty deed. Mary Lake is the wife of John Lake, and, at the time this action of ejectment was brought against them, resided with him upon the premises. Henry Casler died September 15, 1886, leaving issue. The plaintiff claims title to the land in question under quitclaim deeds obtained from the descendants of Henry Casler, executed and delivered before his death; also, a quitclaim deed purporting to have been given by other persons, styling themselves "heirs at law of Peter Casler, deceased," dated after Henry's death. Some of them were admitted to be heirs at law of Henry Casler. Thus we find the plaintiff claiming title, and a right to recover the premises, by virtue of a deed from Henry Casler's heirs, while the defendants are in possession, claiming under a deed from Henry Casler himself. The plaintiff contends (1) that Henry Casler took only a life estate, with remainder to his heirs; (2) that the purchase of the lands at tax sale inured to the benefit of the remaindermen, and title, as against them, cannot be claimed under such deeds. On the other hand, the defendants say that Henry Casler took title in fee simple, under the will, and that, failing in that, his tax deeds gave him such title.

The will has been quoted. It conveyed a life estate to Betsey Casler, with remainder to her son Henry. So far there can be no dispute. Was this a remainder in fee simple? Obviously, this must depend upon the construction to be given to the words, "I give and bequeath to Henry Casler, my son, and after his decease said real estate to belong to his heirs." Does this language evince an intention upon the part of the testator to limit Henry's interest to an estate for life?

in favor of the tenant for life paramount to that of the reversioner or remainderman. Carter v. Youngs, 10 Jones & S. 418, 421.

And such obligation must be discharged even if it exhausts the whole of the rents. King v. King, 9 Jones & S. 516.

Such duty does not rest upon the theory that there ought to be an equitable division of the charges upon the land between the several owners of the fee, as he is bound to pay them even if he does not own any portion of the fee. Ibid.

So, a tenant for life cannot recover annual taxes paid by him as against the remaindermen, even when ejected by the latter and though he holds under a deed purporting to convey the fee. Bone v. Tyrrell, 113 Mo. 175, 188.

Where property was leased and demised for a term of the defendant's natural life, at the annual rent of a dollar, with power to sublet and collect the rents during the term without either covenants or conditions or clause of re-entry, it was held that the defendant was bound to keep down the taxes, and that in case of his neglect so to do a receiver would be appointed. Carter v. Youngs, supra.

While taxes are due and payable in advance on the first day of each year, yet the tenant for life should not be charged therewith any longer than his tenancy, and therefore if he dies during the year the same should be apportioned between himself and the remainderman. Crump's Estate, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 478.

In the above case the court followed its prior decision in the case of Fest's Estate, 28 W. N. C. 415.

Where a borough ordinance made it the duty of the owner or occupier to pave the sidewalk with brick within three months after the passing of the enactment, it was held that the tenant for life was chargeable with the expenses thus incurred. Hitner v. Ege, 23 Pa. 305.

It has been held that a land tax and quit rents and other charges were not apportionable as between the life tenant and the remainderman. Sutton v. Chaplin, 10 Ves. Jr. 66.

Where it was insisted that the tax in question could not be wholly imposed upon the tenant for life, as it was in the nature of an assessment for a sewer tax, and was to be regarded as a permanent benefit, the court did not decide the point, for the reason that, if the life estate was not to be sold first, then the sale was to be according to the general provisions of the statute. Weaver v. Arnold, 15 R. I. 53, 55.

In Hite v. Hite, 93 Ky. 257, 19 L. R. A. 173, it was held that money expended from the income of an estate for taxes or improvements upon unproductive real estate should be refunded to the life tenants from the proceeds of the sale of such real estate.

b. General rule as to assessments.

The general rule applicable to the relation of life tenants and remaindermen does not authorize the former to charge the latter with the costs and expenses of permament improvements put upon the property by him during the life tenancy; and it is also the general rule that municipal assessments for permanent improvements are apportionable between the tenant for life and the remainderman according to the circumstances of the case and their respective interests in the property. Thomas v. Evans, 105 N. Y. 601, 611, 59 Am. Rep. 519.

Equity apportions the burdens occasioned by assessments for improvements upon the land between the tenant for life, who has the present enjoyment of the property, and the remainderman, whose right of enjoyment is postponed until the death of the tenant for life. King v. King, 9 Jones & S. 516.

So, extraordinary assessments and permanent

If the intention had been to devise an estate in fee simple, the most apt and proper words would have been, "I give and devise to Henry Casler, my son, his heirs and assigns forever." An equally effective and perhaps common method of expression would be "I give and devise to Henry Casler, my son," the law in such case supplying the necessary words to create the estate in fee simple. But this testator used neither expression, but added to the devise to Henry the provision that after his decease "said real estate should belong to his heirs,"—words which necessarily imply that Henry Casler was to have only a life estate, if they are not to be treated as superfluous. We are not without precedents in this state which warrant the conclusion that this devised a life estate. Fraser v. Chene, 2 Mich. 81, construed a will in which the following language was used: "I give and bequeath unto my beloved son, Gabriel Chene, my eldest, the farm I now reside on, for and during his lifetime, with all the appurtenances thereon; and after he, my said son, the said Garbriel Chene, is deceased, then the right, title, and appurtenances of the aforesaid farm is to become the property of the said Gabriel Chene's male heirs." The court said: "It would seem to anyone reading the will in this case that the intention of the testator to give a life estate only to his son Gabriel was so very plain that it could not be doubted." In the case of Gaukler v. Moran, 66 Mich. 354, the testator devised premises to a daughter "during her natural life, and afterwards to her heirs and assigns." This was held to give the daughter a life estate merely. See also Cousino v. Cousino, 86 Mich. 323; Jones v. Deming, 91 Mich. 481. We are of the opinion that the words used indicated a plain intention to give to Henry Casler a life estate only. This being so, the statute (2 How. Anno. Stat. § 5544) applies, and the heirs of Henry Casler take as purchasers. This may seem at variance with the case of Fraser v. Chene, supra, but it is not, as the will in that case antedated the statute.

One Hartwell testified on behalf of the defendant that he drew the will, and that he had a conversation with the testator, at the time the will was drawn and executed, in regard to the provision hereinbefore mentioned, and that he understood the testator to wish Henry to have the land "in his own name, free;" that the witness "was in doubt, some, how to word the will, as it was new business to him;" and that "he asked the testator particularly what he wished,—how he wished the estate disposed of after his death,—whether Henry was to be allowed to use it all, or keep it in trust," and he said: "'It is no matter. Henry will not have anything left, any way. It is all for Henry.'

Q. Did you understand you were creating a fee simple?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. By the use of those words?

A. Yes, sir."

improvements should be apportioned between the tenant for life and the remainderman. De Witt v. Cooper, 18 Hun, 67; Lawrence v. Holden, 3 Bradf. 142; Cairns v. Chabert, 3 Edw. Ch. 312.

And the life tenant must pay his equitable proportion of assessments for local improvements. Fleet v. Dorland, 11 How. Pr. 489.

The same doctrine is declared in Outcalt v. Appleby, 36 N. J. Eq. 73, 80, as to assessments for improvements which go to the benefit of the inheritance, as to which some equitable method of apportionment between the income and the corpus should be adopted.

To the same effect, Holcombe v. Holcombe, 29 N. J. Eq. 597; Pratt v. Douglas, 38 N. J. Eq. 516, 542.

An outstanding life estate is chargeable with an equitable apportionment of assessments for local improvements which are of permanent benefit to the property. Re Miller, 1 Tucker, 346, 348.

Assessments are imposed upon the remaindermen because although they are special taxes, they are deemed to be levied for the benefit accruing to the estate in consequence of a public improvement. King v. King, 9 Jones & S. 516.

In Bobb v. Wolff, 54 Mo. App. 515, where the freehold had been benefited in a substantial manner by work, with respect to which a special tax had been imposed upon the property, it was held that as between the tenant for life and the remaindermen the tax was to be ratably and equitably apportioned, there being a likelihood of a substantial benefit to the remainder.

In the above case the property had been improved by means of granite pavements.

So, a municipal assessment for the flagging of sidewalks and other improvements must be apportioned between the tenant for life and the remainderman. Gillespie v. Brooks, 2 Redf. 363.

In Peck v. Sherwood, 53 N. Y. 615, it was held that a municipal assessment for flagging a sidewalk in front of a homestead was not an annual tax chargeable to the tenant for life, neither was it a permanent improvement of such a nature as to exempt him from contributing to its payment, but was an improvement which ought to be apportioned between himself and the remainderman.

So in Roche v. Waters, 72 Md. 264, 7 L. R. A. 533, assessments for street improvements were charged to the life tenant.

In Gunning v. Carman, 3 Redf. 69, an assessment levied before the death of the tenant for life for permanent improvements was paid after his death with interest by the trustees of the estate, and it was held that the interest from the date of the levy to the time of the death of the life tenant was properly chargeable to him, but that the balance and the principal were to be charged to the remainderman.

The remainderman ought to pay the principal of permanent improvements. King v. King, 9 Jones & S. 516.

Under the Massachusetts [statute] an assessment for betterment upon the laying out of a highway is a tax, not, however, in the nature of an ordinary tax, but in the nature of an extraordinary assessment laid on the premises in view of the permanently increased value of the estate by reason of the public improvement of the vicinity, and must therefore be treated, as between the life tenant and remainderman, as an incumbrance on the whole estate to which the tenant for life must contribute to the extent of interest during his life on the amount paid, and at his death the remaindermen must bear the charge of the principal, the burden of the assessment being borne by them in the same proportions in which they would have received the benefit of the entire damages assessed against the city, in case the estate had been

This testimony was afterwards stricken out, on motion of plaintiff's counsel, upon which error is assigned. There was no ambiguity on the face of the instrument, and the testimony was not admissible. Fraser v. Chene, supra; Kinney v. Kinney, 34 Mich. 250; Waldron v. Waldron, 45 Mich. 354; Forbes v. Darling, 94 Mich. 625.

It being settled that Henry Casler's title to the premises, acquired through the will terminated at his death, we will next consider the question of the tax titles. It will be remembered that he procured a tax deed of the premises before the termination of Betsey Casler's estate. These taxes were properly assessed to Betsey Casler, who owed the duty of payment, both to the state, and to the remaindermen. Jenks v. Horton, 96 Mich. 13; Smith v. Blindbury, 66 Mich. 319. But Henry Casler was in a different situation. He certainly owed no duty of payment to the state, though his interest in the premises was liable to sale therefor. It is a general proposition that a life tenant to whom taxes are assessed, and upon whom the law imposes the burden of such taxes, cannot acquire the title in fee by allowing the premises to be sold for taxes, and bidding them in, thus cutting off the remainderman. But in this case Henry Casler was not a life tenant in possession, and, so far as the record shows, he had not done anything tending to show whether or not he had accepted the devise prior to the time he obtained his tax deeds, which manifestly he was under no obligation to do unless he chose. 2 Redf. Wills, 304, and cases cited; Doe, Smyth, v. Smyth, 6 Barn. & C. 116; 4 Kent, Com. 534; Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1075–1079. In 3 Washb. Real Prop. p. 6, the author says: "An heir at law is the only person who, by the common law, becomes the owner of land without his own agency or assent. A title by deed or devise requires the assent of the grantee or devisee before it can take effect." Again, at page 542, the author says: "It is hardly necessary to add, that no one can make another the owner of an estate against his consent by devising it to him, so that, if the devisee named disclaim the devise it becomes inoperative, and goes to the heir." It is said that a parol disclaimer will not prevent the devisee from subsequently claiming the devise, and that the reason of the necessity of a deed grows out of the presumptive vesting of the devised interest in the devisee before entry. See Perry v. Hale, 44 N. H. 365. It is, in our opinion, illogical to say that a deed is necessary because of the presumption that the title has vested, when the title does not vest by a devise unless there is an acceptance. It would seem that the deed would be necessary only where the title had actually vested, which appears to depend upon acceptance. If it be admitted that the law will presume an acceptance, it is not a conclusive presumption, and, when it is shown to have been renounced, it is shown that the title did not vest, and apparently there would be no injured instead of being benefited by the improvement. Plympton v. Boston Dispensary, 106 Mass. 544, 547.

II. Tenant by the curtesy.

The doctrine that a tenant for life is bound to keep down the taxes upon the property has been held to apply to a husband entitled to the use and profits of the wife's estate. Creutz v. Heil, 89 Ky. 429; Johnson v. Stewart, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 557.

A tenant by the curtesy must keep down the taxes. King v. King, 9 Jones & S. 516.

In Wade v. Malloy, 16 Hun, 226, action was brought by the remainderman to recover damages sustained by the failure of the tenant by the curtesy to keep down the interest on a mortgage and to pay the annual taxes which had accrued thereto. It was held the action would lie. In that case the life tenant, by his neglect, had caused the property to be foreclosed and the land sold, and plaintiff sought to recover the damages occasioned thereby.

III. Tenant in dower.

There is nothing peculiar in the nature of a tenancy in dower to distinguish it, in respect to the payment of taxes, from other estates of freehold for life, and the widow, standing in the place of the husband in respect of the portion of the land assigned her in dower, must necessarily be held subject to the charges, duties, and services to which the estate may be properly liable. Whyte v. Nashville, 2 Swan, 364.

And a tenant in dower therefore stands in the same position as any other tenant for life. Ibid.

A widow is seised of the freehold, and is, properly speaking, the owner of the estate, to the extent of the assignment in dower. Ibid.

If land is assigned to a widow for her dower, although she has only the present enjoyment of the land, yet she must pay the taxes. King v. King, 9 Jones & S. 516.

A widow who becomes a tenant for life in a dower interest in her husband's land is bound to pay the taxes on the land. Little v. Edwards, 84 Wis. 649.

When a charge is upon the entire estate of which the husband died seised, the dowress is only bound for one-third part of it as she takes only a third; but where the charge falls exclusively upon the part of the estate which has been assigned in dower, she is separately and exclusively liable for the taxes imposed. Whyte v. Nashville, supra.

If a widow, who is entitled to a dower interest in real estate, neglects to pay the taxes and assessments charged upon the premises, the heirs or remaindermen may pay the same in order to protect the estate, and upon so doing are entitled to recover the amount from the widow in an action at law, or may proceed to the appointment of a receiver of the rents and profits. Bidwell v. Greenshield, 2 Abb. N. C. 427.

Where the yearly income or value of the widow's dower in real estate is not susceptible of a division, and when she is to take such annual sum in lieu of dower under §§ 28 and 29 of the Missouri act relating to dower (Rev. Code, 435), such yearly value is the net annual product without the expenditure of money or labor upon it, after deductions have been made from its gross income of all the charges to which it is subject, such as taxes, repairs, etc. Riley v. Clamorgan, 15 Mo. 331, 335.

But with respect to taxes assessed and unpaid before the assignment of dower, they cannot be charged upon the estate assigned to the widow where there is personal estate sufficient to pay them. Harrison v. Peck, 56 Barb. 251, 265; Vanderbeck v. Rochester, 122 N. Y. 285, Affirming 46 Hun, 87.

So, the dower interest of a widow cannot be occasion for devesting a title that had not vested. There are two classes of cases in which it may become necessary to determine what constitutes a renunciation or acceptance: (1) Cases where the devisee or his privies are denying renunciation; and (2) where they are asserting it. In the former (i. e. before the devisee can be deprived of the estate) there are cases that hold that renunciation is not to be lightly inferred, and that equivocal acts will not do, and it has been contended that a deed is necessary when the devise is of an absolute and unconditional fee. On the other hand, if the devisee or his privies are asserting renunciation, or, what is equivalent, denying acceptance, it has been said that "the presumption of assent is never conclusive; neither are acts which indicate an intention to accept." Wheeler v. Lester, 1 Bradf. 293; Perry v. Hale, supra. But an entry and occupation under the will have been considered the most satisfactory evidence of acceptance, in cases where action has been brought against the devisee, where the devise was subject to the payment of debts. Pickering v. Pickering, 6 N. H. 120; Glen v. Fisher, 6 Johns. Ch. 34, 10 Am. Dec. 310; Kelsey v. Western, 2 N. Y. 501. In this case the devisee is dead, and his grantee sets up the claim that he entered and occupied the premises under another title; i. e. a tax title acquired after the devise, but before the end of the preceding estate. There is no other evidence bearing upon the question of acceptance or renunciation, except the fact that he claimed title in fee, contrary to the terms of the devise, and we are asked to determine whether this was sufficient evidence or renunciation to go to the jury. In Doe, Smyth, v. Smyth, 6 Barn. & C. 112, the court said that a devisee cannot be compelled to accept the devised interest, but may by some mode renounce and disclaim it. ". . . And it is not necessary in the present case to decide whether such renunciation and disclaimer may be by parol, because in whatever form they are made, we think they must be a clear and unequivocal disclaimer of any estate in the land. In this case the disclaimer is not of any estate in the land, but only of benefit under the will, accompanied in every instance with an assertion of a right to the land by a higher and better title. This proceeded on a mistake, of which the lessor [devisee] of the plaintiff, though slowly and reluctantly, was at last convinced. No case similar to this was cited, or has been found. And we therefore think the lessor of the plaintiff is not precluded from acting under her improved judgment, and taking the land as devisee under the will." Here the devisee was denying renunciation, and her contention was sustained. Whatever we may think of the holding that a disclaimer of a devise is not good unless it goes to the extent of disclaiming any interest in the land, although such claim may be based upon other and better title, it must be conceded that the case turned upon that, or that, at all events, it did not decide that a disclaimer must be diminished by the taxes or any portion of the taxes assessed against the land, either in her husband's lifetime or during her quarantine. Graves v. Cochran, 68 Mo. 74; State, Moore, v. White, 61 Mo. 442.

Where a husband conveyed land without the wife's releasing her right to dower, and before his death taxes and assessments for municipal improvements were levied upon such property, it was held that the widow was entitled to dower free from the taxes, but that such dower should be assigned subject to the increased value arising from such permanent improvements charged with one third of the principal of such assessments during the continuance of her estate. Jonas v. Hunt, 40 N. J. Eq. 660.

In Ware v. Owens, 42 Ala. 212, 94 Am. Dec. 642, a widow claimed dower out of partnership lands, and in assessing the same and interest upon the arrears thereof, the court stated that the statute allowed no abatement for taxes or anything else.

A widow who is charged on a settlement of her accounts as administratrix, for failure to have her dower assigned as for a devastavit, is chargeable with only two thirds of the value of the rent from the time when she should have had dower assigned, the other one third belonging to her as dower, and she is entitled to have two thirds of the taxes credited to her for the same time. Benagh v. Turrentine, 60 Ala. 557, 561.

Where, with regard to a dowress, the owner of the fee occupied the position of a tenant per autre vie, and was entitled to possession during the husband's life, and thereafter on demand the widow's right matured, it was held he was therefore subject to the general rule that tenants for life in possession are bound to meet the annual charges upon the estate so that they may not become a charge against those entitled in remainder. Jonas v. Hunt, supra.

Where apartments in a dwelling house in New York city were given to a widow in assignment of dower the remainder of the house being in the possession of the heir at law and, in order to relieve her share of the premises from a sale for nonpayment of taxes, and to prevent the accumulation of a percentage as a penalty for nonpayment, she paid the whole of the amount due, it was held she was entitled to recover the same or a proportion thereof from the heir at law with interest from the time of payment. Graham v. Dunigan, 2 Bosw. 516.

In the above case it was held that the taxes and assessments ought to be equitably apportioned between the widow and the heir, although such an apportionment could not be made in a manner which would entitle either party to pay a portion thereof and discharge his part of the premises from the charge or encumbrance.

As between the widow, who is tenant in dower, and the heirs, assessments which relate to and benefit the fee are to be borne by the heirs, and the widow is not to be chargeable with them, but she must bear one third of the interest of the capital of the assessments on the property assigned to her for dower, to commence from the time the assessments were confirmed and became a charge, provided that such confirmation and charge were subsequent to the widow's death. Williams v. Cox, 3 Edw. Ch. 178.

It has been held that the 27th section of the Illinois dower act, which declares that the widow may in all cases retain the full possession of the dwelling house in which her husband must usually dwell next before his death, together with the outhouses and plantation thereto belonging, free from molestation and rent until her dower is assigned, is plain and will not admit of construction, and extends to the entire plantation, and that therefore the widow, being entitled as tenant for life in dower by deed. This case was decided in 1826. The case of Bryan v. Hyre, 1 Rob. (Va.) 102, 39 Am. Dec. 246, decided in 1842, affirmed a case where the trial judge had instructed the jury that a disclaimer of a devise must be in writing. This is based upon the rule laid down in Coke upon Littleton,—that where a devisee enters the freehold is in him before he enters, and in that case the heir takes nothing. Co. Litt. 111*a*. The case of Townson v. Tickell was cited, but it does not decide the point, for there the disclaimer was in writing. The decision really rests upon Doe, Smyth, v. Smyth, 6 Barn. & C. 112, which, as has been shown, did not pass upon the question. Indeed, that case (i. e. Doe, Smyth, v. Smyth) seems to have overlooked the earlier case of Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31, decided in 1819. The Virginia case mentions it to disapprove the opinion of Holroyd, J., where he says: "I think that an estate cannot be forced on a man. A devise, however, being prima facie for the devisee's benefit, he is supposed to assent to it, until he does some act to show his dissent. The law presumes that he will assent, until the contrary be proved; when the contrary, however, is proved, it shows that he never did assent to the devise, and, consequently that the estate never was in him. I cannot think that it is necessary for a party to go through the form of disclaiming in a court of record, nor that he should be at the trouble or expense of executing a deed to show that he did not assent to the devise. Unless some strong authority were shown to that effect, I cannot think that the law requires either of these forms. I am confirmed in that opinion by the case of Bonifaut v. Greenfield, 1 Leon. 60, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 80." In that case the renunciation was by deed, and it was claimed that was insufficient, and that a disclaimer in a court of record was necessary. All of the judges agreed that the disclaimer by deed was good, and the dictum contained in the opinion of Holroyd was apparently approved by the other justices. So far, then, we have dictum against dictum, in the English cases, with the Virginia case holding a writing necessary. The question was up in Massachusetts in the same year that Doe, Smyth, v. Smyth was decided (i. e. 1826). Stebbins v. Lathrop, 4 Pick. 43. It was there held that nothing short of an express renunciation could be taken notice of by a court of probate. The court said: "Nothing appears amounting to a renunciation. But, if this were doubtful the question is not to be settled in the court of probate. The respondent has a right to be heard on this point in a court of law, and he cannot be so heard if the grant of probate should be revoked. The most that appears at present is an intention to renounce, and even this is not very clear. It is possible that the intention was merely to impede the creditors in the collection of their debts. Until the legatees shall actually renounce their legacies, their assent to the provisions of the will which are apparently beneficial to them will be presumed. Townson v. Tick- to receive the rents and profits, is bound to pay the taxes during such time as she has the exclusive control and enjoyment thereof. Strawn v. Strawn, 50 Ill. 256.

The New York statutes (2 Rev. Stat. 491, § 18), declaring the effect of the admeasurement of dower and the recovery thereof, provide that the widow shall hold the same during her natural life subject to the payment of all taxes and charges accruing thereon subsequent to her taking possession, and therefore such provision makes her liable for the taxes upon the premises assigned or admeasured to her. Bidwell v. Greenshield, 2 Abb. N. C. 431.

Under § 6 of 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 741, which provides for the dower of a widow in surplus moneys on foreclosure, the widow's dower interest is to be ascertained after deducting the costs and expenses of the proceedings, as well as the amount due on the mortgage. It was held that the taxes and assessments upon such real estate were not to be deducted in ascertaining the amount in which she was dowable. Taylor v. Bentley, 3 Redf. 34.

In Linden v. Graham, 34 Barb. 316, the plaintiff, who was entitled to the fee simple of the premises in question subject to a widow's right to dower, brought action under the New York statute of April 12, 1855, against the widow for the purpose of obtaining a due apportionment of taxes and assessments, and for an adjustment of the same, and sought a decree compelling the widow to pay her proportion of the same, and it was held the action would lie, the court stating that such action might even have been maintained in equity under the old system of practice.

Where the widow occupied the intestate's residence with his children, some of whom were of age, it was held that she was not chargeable with taxes accruing between her husband's death and the assignment of dower. Branson v. Yancy, 1 Dev. Eq. 77.

In the above case, however, there was a dissenting opinion, Justice Henderson holding her liable therefor.

A valid sale and conveyance of land for the nonpayment of taxes will, under the terms of the Ohio statute, bar even the right of a widow to dower. Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 430.

In ascertaining the net rents of a widow entitled to dower under the provisions of the Ohio statute, § 14 of the act of January 22, 1823, the expenses of reasonable repairs and taxes should be deducted from the gross rentals, but no reduction should be made on account of water rents or insurance. Hillgartner v. Gebhart, 25 Ohio St. 557.

IV. Property taken in lieu of dower.

Where the dividends and income of shares of bank stock were devised to a wife during her natural life, or so long as she remained a widow, in lieu of dower, with remainder over to the daughters of the testator who were also residuary legatees, it was held that the gift did not amount to an annuity but was one of the income, and that therefore the tenant for life was bound to pay the taxes upon the stock, she receiving the income thereof. Pearson v. Chace, 10 R. I. 455.

In Spangler v. York County, 13 Pa. 322, testator directed that his wife should have the interest of the dower fund, or a third part of the whole, which said interest should be paid to her annually during her natural life or widowhood, the dower fund to be invested on good real estate, the other two thirds of his real and personal estate to be equally divided among his children, and the question was whether the sum so put to interest for the widow's use was taxable for state and county purposes, and if so, by whom the tax was payable. The court held that such fund was so taxable, and that the taxes were payable out of the interest of the same.

ell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31. If they should persist in the intention to renounce the estate, the probate of the will will not restrain them. And then the question will be fairly raised whether this can be done to the prejudice of creditors. This being the light in which we view this point, it will not be necessary to determine whether the acts of the devisees will in law amount to a renunciation. It is sufficient to justify the proceedings of the judge of probate in this particular that these acts, taken together,—especially the acts of Miner Stebbins,—are equivocal, and that nothing short of an express renunciation can be taken notice of in a court of probate. And there seems no good reason why the fact should not be verified by the record, when the parties are present and may renounce if they are so inclined. No doubt a devisee may disclaim by deed the estate devised, as was decided in the case of Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31; and perhaps he may disclaim without being subjected to the expense and trouble of executing a deed, as Holroyd, J., seemed to think. But it does not follow that a court of probate shall receive evidence of such disclaimer, and most certainly not when the evidence relates to acts of a doubtful bearing. In the case of Proctor v. Atkyns, 1 Mass. 321, it was decided that a court of probate could not determine upon a claim set up by deed, because it was determinable exclusively at the common law. The same reason applies with force to the supposed disclaimer in this case." In Webster v. Gilman, 1 Story, C. C. 499, Fed. Cas. No. 17,335, the following appears: "It may be even doubtful whether under our laws any renunciation, or disclaimer, not by deed or matter of record, would be an extinguishment of the right of the devisee. But, at all events, it should be evidenced by some solemn act or acknowledgment in writing, or by some open and positive act of renunciation, or disclaimer which will prevent all future cavil, and operate in point of evidence as a quasi estoppel." Here, again, the question was not decided. The question was before the United States circuit court again in Ex parte Fuller, 2 Story, C. C. 330, Fed. Cas. No. 5,147, and again it was not passed upon. The court said: "As to the other point, there is no doubt that the devisee must consent, otherwise the title does not vest in him. But where the estate is devised absolutely, and without any trust or incumbrances, the law will presume it to be accepted by the devisee, because it is for his benefit; and some solemn, notorious act is required, to establish his renunciation or disclaimer of it. Until that is done, stabit presumptio pro veritate. That is sufficiently shown by the case of Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31, cited at the bar, and the still later case of Doe, Smyth, v. Smyth, 6 Barn. & C. 112. Brown v. Wood, 17 Mass. 68, and Ward v. Fuller, 15 Pick. 185, manifestly proceeded upon the same foundation. Now, in the present case, there is no pretense to say, that Ross has ever renounced or dis-

So, in Harrison v. Peck, 56 Barb. 251, 265, certain lands were set apart by deed executed by the sole devisee and the dowress to the latter for dower, and the balance was released by her, and after a recital to the effect that the lands of which the decedent died seised were subject to certain unpaid taxes and assessments, the parties covenanted to pay "his or her fair equitable and legal proportion thereof." It was held that the widow was bound to pay her fair and equitable proportion of such unpaid taxes and assessments, even though the land was subject to the same at the time of her marriage, and that there was no proportion of such taxes for her to assume.

Where bonds were secured by mortgage, and represented the principal sum, which was payable with interest, the interest being payable to the widow in lieu of dower, the persons entitled in remainder being entitled to the principal fund and the widow to a life estate, it was held that the assessment and tax should be levied only upon the amount of interest which had become due and was unpaid upon the bonds and mortgage when, in contemplation of law, the assessment was made. State, Hill, v. Hansom, 36 N. J. L. 50.

Where one, in satisfaction of a widow's dower, mortgaged land on condition to pay her a given amount annually, it was held that the payment being annually secured by the land, it was liable for the tax in proportion as the land paid. Atwood v. Lamprey, 3 P. Wms. 127, note.

In Clarke v. Clarke, 8 Misc. 339, 342, a testator devised the use of his homestead to his wife during her life or widowhood, and also bequeathed an annuity in lieu of dower, giving the residue of his estate to an executor with power to sell and distribute it among his heirs in the same manner as though he had died intestate; and the testator directed that the taxes, repairs, necessary improvements and insurance should be paid out of his general estate without any charge upon the wife's annuity, with a proviso that if she rented the whole or any part of the homestead she should bear a proportion of such charges according to the part so rented, which sum should be retained out of the annuity. It was held, where the widow elected to occupy the premises and the whole balance of the estate became exhausted, that the testator's intention was to relieve the wife's estate from the taxes, and that the same was not, as between herself and the heirs, chargeable with the taxes assessed during the continuance of such life estate, even though the executor was without funds wherewith to pay the same.

V. As between husband and wife.

In Paul v. Fries, 18 Fla. 573, 586, it was held that under the Florida statute real estate was to be assessed in the name of the owner or occupant, and the statute giving the husband the care and management of his wife's property, the possession thereof by the family was the possession and occupancy of the husband, and that he was therefore rightly assessed as occupant, even though his wife lived with him.

Where an assessment was made upon the proprietors of adjoining land for the expenses incurred in the flagging and paving of the sidewalk, the proprietors being husband and wife, the husband a tenant for life, and the wife a tenant in fee simple, it was held that such assessment should be apportioned to each in proportion to the right of property, and the sum due from the tenant for life should be directed to be paid by him, while the amount due from the wife as tenant in fee simple should have been assessed on her. Williams v. Brace, 5 Conn. 190, 195.

In Vanderbeck v. Rochester, 122 N. Y. 285, Affirming 46 Hun, 87, action was brought to recover the sum paid as the amount of an assessment, less claimed the estate devised to him. The statement of facts is, that he has done no act accepting or declining the devise. If so, then the presumption of law is, that he has, by implication, accepted it, since it gives him an unconditional fee." The case of Ward v. Fuller, 15 Pick. 185, went no further than to hold that a devisee before entry had a sufficient seisin to maintain a writ of right. In 4 Kent, Com. pp. 533, 534, it is said that "an estate vests, under a devise, on the death of the testator, before entry. But a devisee is not bound to accept of a devise to him nolens volens, and he may renounce the gift, by which act the estate will descend to the heir, or pass in some other direction under the will. The disclaimer and renunciation must be by some unequivocal act, and it is left undecided whether a verbal disclaimer will be sufficient. . . . And some judges have held that it may be by a verbal renunciation. Perhaps the case will be governed by circumstances." See also Perry v. Hale, 44 N. H. 364.

Form the foregoing, we conclude that an acceptance should be presumed in this case, which presumption may be overthrown by acts inconsistent with acceptance. The only evidence here is the purchase of tax titles, and procuring and recording tax deeds of the premises, and the conveyance, by full warranty deed, within two years after Betsey Casler's death, of the premises devised. The inference is strong that Henry Casler's design in obtaining the deeds was to acquire a better title than that conveyed by the will, either because of some inherent defect in the latter, or from a desire to obtain the fee. There is perhaps room for the suspicion that his mother, Betsey Casler, permitted this, as the plaintiff's counsel contends, or that Henry accomplished it without her knowledge, but in either case it tended to show a desire to obtain a better title than he then had. It does not necessarily follow that he was willing to disclaim a valid life estate for his chances under a tax title which, if invalid, might compel him to share his life estate with his brothers and sisters. Again, the testimony of the witness Bear that he found the land advertised in the paper, and bid it in, tends to show that the sale was not the result of collusion or fraud, and that Henry Casler obtained the tax title from Bear to protect his mother as well as himself. This testimony should not have been stricken out upon plaintiff's motion. If the son, Henry Casler, never accepted the devise, it is an end of the case upon this record, entitling the defendants to a verdict, inasmuch as the tax deeds are prima facie valid, and conveyed the fee.

But, if Henry Casler accepted the devise, it becomes necessary to inquire whether he can set up his tax deeds against the remaindermen. This is said to depend upon the question whether he owed a duty to them to pay the taxes, or preserve the estate for them, analogous to the duty which his mother owed to him and them. We have found no case upon all fours with this, and we doubt if it can be said that the law imposes any such duty upon the second life tenant, during the tenancy of his predecessor, but we think it credit allowed for damages for land taken, made upon real estate by plaintiff's husband in his lifetime, more than six years having elapsed since the payment of the assessment, with no steps taken to open and make available for the public use the street which was the basis of the assessment, plaintiff alleging, as the foundation of her right, a failure on the part of the defendant to return any consideration for the money paid. The facts showed that the assessment was valid when made, and also that the personal estate of the intestate was inadequate to pay the same, and that upon receipt of notice charging interest upon such assessment the plaintiff paid the same. It was held that she was not entitled to recover back the sum so paid, the assessment having been made prior to the intestate's death and was therefore payable out of his personal estate, and there was no legal obligation upon the plaintiff to pay, her only interest in the estate being that of dower, which interest was not in jeopardy, the payment on her part being merely voluntary, and although made under mistake of law was so done with a full knowledge of the facts and circumstances, there being no fraud or improper conduct.

VI. Assignee of life tenant.

In Prettyman v. Walston, 34 Ill. 175, 191, where a wife who was tenant for life in real estate assigned her life interest, it was held that such assignee was bound to pay the annual taxes.

The obligation of a tenant for life to pay his proportion of a special tax for work which enhances the value of the property in a substantial manner will not be released by a transfer of his life estate, where such tax is levied during his tenancy and is payable prior to the date of such transfer. Bobb v. Wolff, 54 Mo. App. 515.

A purchaser at a sale under a judgment of a life estate takes it cum onere and must devote the rents and profits to the payment of the taxes due before the purchase as well as to subsequent taxes. Murch v. J. O. Smith Mfg. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 193.

VII. Duty in case of dispute.

If a tenant for life disputes the legality of the taxes assessed upon the property, he should notify the reversioner of the fact in order that he may be indemnified against loss in case payment is resisted. Stetson v. Day, 51 Me. 434.

VIII. Decisions under state statutes.

The Revised Statutes of Kentucky have not changed the law as it existed before their adoption, and therefore a tenant for life is bound to pay the taxes assessed upon the property. Johnson v. Smith, 5 Bush, 102.

Under 2 Ky. Rev. Stat. chap. 83, art. 5, § 2, p. 250, which provides that all estates real and personal, and all interests in such estates, named and specified in the tax book, shall be assessed for taxation, and the tax paid by the owner or possessor thereof to the person authorized by law to receive the same, the person entitled to and owning the life estate in possession must pay the taxes on the fair value of such land, without reference to whether he owned the fee or only a life estate. Arnold v. Smith, 3 Bush, 163.

N. Y. Laws 1841, chap. 341, and Laws 1854, chap. 391, make provision for carrying out the rule of law which charges an outstanding life estate with an equitable apportionment of assessments for local improvements which are of permanent benefit to the property. Re Miller, Tucker, 346, 348; Fleet v. Dorland, 11 How. Pr. 489.

As to taxes and assessments, if the parties will not does not necessarily turn upon a duty to pay. While he was under no obligation to preserve the estate, if he chose to do so that he might reap the benefit of the devise, he should be content to look to the occupant, whose duty it was to pay them, for reimbursement, or, if not, he could expect no more than contribution from the other remaindermen, to whose benefit, as well as his own, such payment inured. It would be inequitable to permit him to claim title under such circumstances, where he took under the same will that gave him an estate, thereby recognizing their right. Good faith towards the testator should forbid such an attempt to defeat his purpose. Were this claim to be sustained, it would make it easy for two life tenants, by collusion, to defeat the remaindermen, under circumstances like these. It may be said that this could be done by the mere disclaimer, but this is a mistake. See How. Anno. Stat. § 5548. We are cited to Blackwood v. Van Vleit, 30 Mich. 118, and Sands v. Davis, 40 Mich. 14, to sustain the claim that Henry Casler was under no disability as a claimant of the fee under the tax deed. The former was a case where one who went into possession before the tax levy was held not to be precluded from making and relying upon a purchase of land at tax sale. In Sands v. Davis the question arose between tenants in common. In that case one bought a tax title that was outstanding at the time of the purchase of his interest in the premises, and therefore which he owed no duty to the state or his cotenants to pay, and it was held that he might set up such title against his cotenants. Both of these cases recognize the proposition that one asserting a tax title may be under a disability, owing to his relations to others claiming interests in the land. In Blackwood v. Van Vleit it is said: "It was not claimed in the case, so far as the record shows, that there were contract or other relations between Blackwood and Van Vleit that would preclude the latter from buying the former's land for delinquent taxes." In Sands v. Davis, Campbell, Ch. J., uses the following language: "If Sands had gone into possession by the aid of the other tenants, or in recognition of their rights, he might in that way, perhaps, have incurred some duties towards them. But he went in as a stranger to their claims under a claim which denied their existence or validity. He became liable to an action of ejectment the moment he assumed possession. We see, therefore, no reason why he could not then or thereafter, as well as he could have done it before, purchase a title which was at that time adverse to the holders of the whole original title. . . . The case of Blackwood v. Van Vleit, 30 Mich. 118, holds in conformity with these views that there can be no estoppel against purchasing tax titles except against one who had a duty to pay the tax or remove the burden." There is abundant authority that a tenant in common, whose duty it is to pay a portion of the taxes, cannot acquire a title, as against his cotenant, by purchase at a tax sale for the entire tax. Dubois v. Campau, 24 Mich. 360, and notes. 1 Wood, Land. & T. § 54, says: "In the absence of any reservation of rent, or voluntarily contribute their shares, the New York act of 1841 makes provision for the case, and authorizes a bill to be filed by any person interested in the estate, to compel a just and equitable apportionment, and to order a sale of any part or parts in fee to pay the tax or assessment, and to adjust the equities of the parties according to their estates and interests. Fleet v. Dorland, supra.

In North Carolina, by Rev. Stat. chap. 102, § 2, all real estate held by deed, grant, or lease, or by title of dower, curtesy, or otherwise, is subject to the payment of public taxes, except land of the University, and houses set apart for divine worship; and it has been held that under this statute real estate is to be taxed according to its fee-simple value, and whoever is owner of the land for the time being is bound to pay the tax, and therefore one entitled to a life estate therein must pay the same during the continuance of his tenancy. Willard v. Blount, 11 Ired. L. 624.

Section 76 of the Ohio Tax Laws of 1859 (2 Swan & C. 1464) gives the right to the reversioner to forfeit the life estate, whether held by curtesy or as dower, where the tenant neglects to pay the taxes for so long that the land shall be sold for nonpayment, unless the same is redeemed within one year from the time of sale, and the reversioner may redeem the lands in the same manner as other lands may be redeemed in other cases of sale for taxes; but it was held that such right was only an inchoate one until decreed by a court having full jurisdiction. Johnson v. Pettit, 1 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 25.

Under the provisions of R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 42, §§ 4, 6, and chap. 44, §§ 8, 10, 12, it was the intention of the general assembly that the tenant for life who enjoys the use and income of the property should pay the ordinary taxes on it during the continuance of his estate, and that if he neglects to pay them his life estate shall be sold for their payment before any resort is had to the reversion or remainder. Weaver v. Arnold, 15 R. I. 53, 55.

Section 561 of the Tennessee Code provides that the person who is the owner of real estate on a given date in any year shall be bound to pay the taxes assessed thereon for that year, and in the case of Anderson v. Hensley, 8 Heisk. 834, the question as to whether the widow or the devisees were bound to pay the taxes depended upon the question of the ownership of real estate, and the widow, being in possession, was decreed to pay the same.

In Webb v. Burlington, 28 Vt. 188, it was held that, under Vt. Comp. Stat. chap. 80, § 15, property which was bequeathed to and held upon trust as to the interest or income for the benefit of one for life, and after her decease the principal to go to the testator's heirs at law, was assessable to the tenant for life, who was entitled to the income.

If one is entitled to the income and another to the ultimate inheritance or bequest of the principal, without its turning again into the mass of the estate, the purport of the legislature under Vt. Comp. Stat. chap. 80, § 15, ¶ 5, is to make the assessment upon the present usufruct. Ibid.

IX. Devisee for life.

The general doctrine that a tenant for life is bound to pay the taxes accruing during his tenancy applies to one who is a devisee for life, where the will contains no provision to the contrary. Waldo v. Cummings, 45 Ill. 421, 425.

And the rule is well settled, even though the life estate is created by a will, unless the language of the will is so explicit as to require these burdens or some part of them to be paid out of the corpus of other provision in the lease or conveyance providing therefor, a tenant for life as between himself and the reversioner is bound to pay the taxes assessed upon the premises, and if he fails to do so, and they are sold therefor, and the tenant becomes the purchaser, he cannot claim a title in fee against the reversioner." See also Cairns v. Chabert, 3 Edw. Ch. 312; Smith v. Blindbury, 66 Mich. 323; Patrick v. Sherwood, 4 Blatchf. 112, Fed. Cas. No. 10,804; McMillan v. Robbins, 5 Ohio, 28; Pike v. Wassell, 94 U. S. 711, 24 L. ed. 307; Sidenberg v. Ely, 90 N. Y. 257, 43 Am. Rep. 163; Varney v. Stevens, 22 Me. 331; Prettyman v. Walston, 34 Ill. 175; Hitner v. Ege, 23 Pa. 305. Some of these cases hold that where the life tenant is compelled to make permanent betterments, or to pay off encumbrances to prevent a forfeiture, he may enforce contribution against the remaindermen, to the extent of their interest in the land. Cairns v. Chabert, 3 Edw. Ch. 312; Foster v. Hilliard, 1 Story, C. C. 77, Fed. Cas. No. 4,972; Daviess v. Myers, 13 B. Mon. 512; Bell v. New York, 10 Paige, 49; Eastabrook v. Hapgood, 10 Mass. 313; Atkins v. Kron, 8 Ired. Eq. 1.

Thus it appears that while the life tenant in possession may be under no legal obligation to pay an encumbrance, and therefore owes no duty to the remainderman, if to prevent a forfeiture of his estate he does pay it, he has a claim against the interest of the remainderman. Either party may buy in the encumbrance, but cannot hold it to the exclusion of the other, who is willing to contribute his share to the amount paid for the purchase. See cases cited, and Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bulte, 45 Mich. 122; Whitney v. Salter, 36 Minn. 103. In this case it was not clear that any portion of the encumbrance was chargeable to the life tenant, yet it was said that he should be regarded as having made the purchase for the joint benefit of himself and the reversioner or remainderman,—citing 1 Washb. Real Prop. 96; Bisset, Estates for Life, 26; Law Lib. 248; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 500-509. We see no reason why this doctrine should not apply equally to the devisee of a life estate not in possession, and can see no difference in principle. And we think the rule as applicable to taxes as to any other encumbrance. Therefore we think the right to assert these deeds against the remaindermen hinges on the acceptance or renunciation by Henry Casler of the devise.

And the rule exists unless the life tenant voluntarily pays them out of other funds. ST. PAUL TRUST CO. v. MINTZER.

In the case of a tenant for life of lands, it is the duty of the trustees to see that the equitable tenant for life, in rightful possession, pays all taxes and rates. Holcombe v. Holcombe, 29 N. J. Eq. 597.

Unless it appears by the will of a testator that in creating a life estate the taxes should be paid out of his estate, the same must be paid out of the rents and profits by the tenant for life. Clarke v. Clarke, 8 Misc. 339, 342.

A widow, as executrix, cannot pay out of the principal of the estate the interest on mortgages, encumbrances, or taxes upon real estate devised to her for life. Jewell's Estate, 1 W. N. C. 404.

So, a widow, who is equitable tenant for life must pay the taxes. Cadmus v. Combes, 37 N. J. Eq. 264, 266.

Taxes due at the time of the death of a testator should be paid out of his personal estate, but taxes subsequently accruing are chargeable upon the lands and follow the same into the hands of the life tenant. Griswold v. Griswold, 4 Bradf. 216.

In order that an exception may be shown to the general rule there must be a fair, clear provision contained in the will creating the life estate, which exempts the property from the payment of such taxes. Lawrence v. Holden, 3 Bradf. 142.

There must be some express provision contained in the will showing that it was the purpose and intention of the testator to cast the burden of taxation as regards such life estate upon the trust estate, and not upon the life tenant. De Witt v. Cooper, 18 Hun, 67.

In Garland v. Garland, 73 Me. 97, it was held that the duty of the tenant for life to pay the taxes was entirely independent of a condition imposed by the testator, which called for the payment of a certain sum annually to his estate, in order to entitle the devisee to retain the possession during his life, the testator saying nothing which exempted the tenant for life from the performance of the duty to pay taxes.

Where a testator gave to his brother a life estate upon condition that he should pay annually, to those lawfully representing his estate, the legal interest on a specific sum, it was held that this imposed upon such life tenant the payment of the taxes while in possession of the estate, according to the maxim Transit terra cum onere; qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. Ibid.

And where the devise contained the words "free and clear of all encumbrances," it was held that such words were connected with the devise, and with the mode of enjoyment, and did not excuse the life tenant from payment thereof. Lawrence v. Holden, supra.

So, in Lansing v. Lansing, 45 Barb. 182, 189, it was held that a fund directed by a testator to be invested in real-estate securities for the benefit of one for life, with a direction to reinvest the interest during minority, the income, being given without any particular amount being specified, was chargeable with commissions and taxes.

Again, in Sidenberg v. Ely, 90 N. Y. 257, 43 Am. Rep. 163, where a mortgagor devised the mortgaged premises to one for life with remainder over, and it was held that the burden of paying such taxes was cast upon the tenant for life, as well after payment by the mortgagee as before, and that the same were chargeable against his interest in any surplus remaining after foreclosure.

In De Witt v. Cooper, supra, the use of two pieces of real estate was devised to a tenant for life, dependent upon her election to occupy them, and it was held that, having elected to occupy, and accepted the use of the property, the burden of ordinary taxation and needful repairs fell upon such tenant for life.

But where a testator devised real estate, subject to the payment of an annuity, to his daughter for life, with remainder to her issue, and prior to his death such estate had been assessed for taxes and the assessment roll delivered for the purpose of ascertaining the amount, it was held that such taxes were properly paid by his executors out of his estate, and were not chargeable as against the income and rents and profits coming to the tenant for life out of such property, such taxes, being fixed prior title, claiming that the quitclaim deeds given by the heirs of Henry Casler before his death conveyed no interest, for the reason that there "are no heirs to the living." But the statute is a sufficient answer. The remainder was a future estate, which the statute (How. Anno. Stat. § 5551) declares to be descendible, devisable, and alienable in the same manner as estates in possession.

Counsel also contend that the devise is void under How. Anno. Stat. § 5531, which reads as follows: "The absolute power of alienation shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than during the continuance of two lives in being at the creation of the estate, except in the single case mentioned in the next section." We think that statute has no application, for the power of alienation was suspended for the period of two lives in being only, viz., Betsey Casler and Henry Casler. See also § 5535.

Plaintiff's title is also attacked upon the ground of want of jurisdiction in the probate court to admit the will to probate, but we think this question is foreclosed by the stipulation that said will was duly probated, etc.

There is a further question in the case which is discussed by counsel for the defendants. There is nothing to show that the will was ever recorded, while the tax deeds were promptly placed upon record. The latter fact has significance upon the subject of renunciation, because, if Henry Casler was claiming under the will, there was no occasion for his recording such deeds. Again, the defendants are not shown to have had any actual or constructive notice of the will, or the rights of any of the parties under it. He was therefore apparently a bona fide purchaser, relying upon the record of the tax deeds, which was the only title appearing of record in Henry Casler.

As foreshadowed, our conclusion is that it was a question for the jury to determine, whether Henry Casler accepted or renounced the devise, and that it was error to direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

The judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

to his decease becoming debts the payment of which were chargeable upon his estate, the same being within the provisions of 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 389, § 1, and Laws 1882, 410, § 814. Re Babcock, 115 N. Y. 450.

In Plympton v. Boston Dispensary, 106 Mass. 544, 547, real estate was devised in trust to pay three fifths of the income to a daughter and two fifths to charitable purposes, during her life, and on her death the capital was to go to the corporation, the will containing a proviso enabling the daughter to live in a dwelling house upon the premises at a specified low rent against her share of income. An assessment was made upon the dwelling house during such occupation for a betterment occasioned by a public improvement, and it was held that the trustee should pay the assessment out of the capital during the life of the daughter if she lived in the house so long, charging her with interest on the amount paid, distributing such interest between the daughter and the corporation by allowing her to retain the three fifths, collecting and paying the corporation the two fifths.

The same reasons for the rule do not always exist as to a life interest in personalty, that do in a life estate in realty. Wilson v. White, 133 Ind. 614, 19 L. R. A. 581.

The same rule is, however, applied to an investment by an executor under the directions of a will for the benefit of another for life; and so long as the life tenant enjoys the entire produce of the fund, he should be required to keep down the taxes upon it, otherwise the fund would become impaired, and the entire burden thrown upon those who take the fund at the death of the life tenant. Holcombe v. Holcome, 29 N. J. Eq. 597.

It is settled in New Jersey that a life tenant who has the use of a fund must pay the taxes assessed against that fund, his or her liability being limited to the income received. Re Tuttle, 49 N. J. Eq. 259.

So, in the case of a bequest of the income of a fund, the general rule is that the taxes on the fund and the expenses of the trust must be paid out of the income. Re Shipman, 82 Hun, 108.

And in order to construe the terms and provisions of a will so as to render the capital of a trust fund liable for the payment of taxes, the will must show an unmistakable import pointing unequivocally in that direction so as to free the income in the hands of a tenant for life from the payment thereof. Ibid.

In the case of a bequest of the income of real estate "after payment of taxes," it was held that assessments were not to be deducted from the income. Bohde v. Bruner, 2 Redf. 333.

No taxes or expenses of the trust can be recovered against the income of a sum given to a legatee for life to be used and enjoyed by her as her absolute property, so long as the estate is not closed, but remains in the hands of an administrator. Wilson v. White, supra.

Where the gift was not of a specific annuity without charge, but a bequest of a given sum, it was held that the income must be charged with the reasonable expenses of the trust, and the taxes on the principal sum. Clark v. Foster, 8 Met. 568.

But a holder of an annuity can only be taxed on the sum actually due and payable at the time of the assessment. State, Howell, v. Cornell, 31 N. J. L. 374.

In Dorr v. Boston, 6 Gray, 131, the question was whether the plaintiff was legally taxable for shares in the stock of the corporation established in the state of New York and other places, or for the income of those shares, the legal title to which was vested in trustees residing in New York, and held by them "in trust to pay over the income, dividends, or interests" thereon to her, and the court held that under chap. 7, Mass. Rev. Stat., the plaintiff, an unmarried woman, and an inhabitant of the state, was not so taxable.

Where a fund is held in trust for one for life with remainder to another, and a part of such fund is lost by reason of the insecurity of a particular investment, the loss is to be apportioned between the tenant for life and the remainderman, in the proportion which the principal sum involved in the insufficient security bears to the interest due upon it at the time when the security was realized. In such a case taxes assessed against the security while it is held pending realization upon it must be charged against and paid out of the amount apportioned to the life tenant. Re Tuttle, 49 N. J. Eq. 259.

teen years without deducting property tax, it was held he could not afterwards deduct out of the future interest the amount of the property tax on such precedent payments.

In Hepburn v. Hepburn, 2 Bradf. 74, testator gave the whole of his estate, real and personal, to two persons for life with remainder in fee to the issue of one, and, in case of his decease without issue, then over, authorizing his executors to take charge of and rent his real estate and invest the personalty and pay the whole income to the life tenants. It was held that the income was liable to the payment of all ordinary taxes and assessments, and that the balance should be paid to the tenant for life.

Where property was held in trust to pay the income to one for life with remainder over, and it was taxed to the executors on a given date, and the tenant for life died within a year and before the tax was paid, it was held that it could not be apportioned by the executors between the estate of the tenant for life and the remaindermen, but was wholly chargeable upon the former's estate or the income had therefrom. Holmes v. Taber, 9 Allen, 246.

In Whitson v. Whitson, 53 N. Y. 479, testator gave and bequeathed to his wife a life use of a certain sum of money, directing his executors to semiannually pay to her the lawful interest thereof, and after her decease, directed such sum to descend to his heirs by such wife, and, the executors having paid the taxes on such sum out of the interest received by them, and paid the balance to the widow, the latter claimed the whole of the interest without a deduction for such taxes. The court held that such taxes were a charge upon such income, and ought not to be paid out of the estate, the bequest being of the income and not by way of annuity.

Where the trustees assumed the trusts of a will and permitted the daughter, according to its terms, to occupy the premises either personally or by tenants who paid her rent, the trustees paying the taxes and insurance upon such premises out of the income of the residuary fund, which was devised to the trustees upon trust, after deducting all necessary taxes, as therein declared for a period of twenty three years, rendering annual accounts therefor which were approved, but a subsequent account being disapproved of by the younger son of the testator upon the ground that the payments were a misapplication of the income derived from such residuary estate, such son applying for an injunction to restrain such application of income and to recover one third of the amounts so previously paid by them,—the court held that such taxes on the premises so occupied by the daughter ought to be paid from the rents and profits derived therefrom, and could not be charged upon the residuary fund or the income thereof, but the court refused to allow the previous accounts of the trustees, which had been approved, to be opened. Buck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

William L. Mintzer died on the 23d day of February, 1883, at the city of St. Paul, Minn., leaving a will, which was duly probated, and one John Jones, one of the executors named in the will, duly qualified as such, and entered upon the discharge of his duties, but he died about the 4th day of May, 1886, leaving the will unexecuted, and on or about June 11, 1886, this plaintiff was duly appointed by the probate court of Ramsey county as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, and duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of its duties, and ever since has been, and now is, acting as such administrator. Mintzer left surviving him a widow, but no issue. The will has been so far executed that all the just debts and demands existing against him at the time of his death have been paid in full, and all specific legacies of money or personal property and all lawful devises of specific real estate have been paid and satisfied in full, save and except that the tenth subdivision of the will has not been executed. The tenth subdivision reads as follows: "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate I give, bequeath, and devise as follows: I direct my executors to take charge of the same, collecting the rents, paying all taxes, assessments, and charges thereon, and to make report of all their doings to the probate court of Ramsey county, Minnesota, at least once a year. The balance in their hands, if anything shall remain of said rents after paying the charges aforesaid, shall be distributed to the persons entitled to the real estate as hereinafter provided. I wish this to continue during the life of my nephew, William Mintzer, son of George Mintzer, and the life of George A. Hicks, provided, however, that at the expiration of ten years from my death, if either or both of said parties, William Mintzer and George A. Hicks, should be living, nevertheless the property may be sold by the executor or their successors, and the proceeds divided among my nephews and nieces hereinabove named, viz., Sarah Mintzer, daughter of Adam Mintzer (married to one Clough), George, Charles, Fred, John, Amelia, Josephine, Maggie, Charles, Charles Titus, Dr. William Titus, Almira Egbert, and the children of Adam Snyder one share, except and provided that I wish one lot in Dunwell & Spencer's addition to West St. Paul to be given and conveyed to Charles Flynn, aforesaid, his heirs and assigns; the fund was chargeable with taxes. The court held that the same should, until actually set apart, share with the other trusts the income and taxes of the estate, and that as to the personalty of the residue, out of its income should be paid the taxes on the personalty.

Where the interest of personal estate was given to a daughter during her natural life, at her decease the principal to be equally divided among her children, the executors being residuary devisees and legatees, it was held that the testator's intention was to give the daughter a definite annual sum equal to the lawful interest on the amount specified, and that therefore under Mass. Stat. Feb. 28, 1831, § 2, which provides that persons entitled to the income of any personal property held by others in trust for themselves, or for a particular and special use of their wives, shall be taxed for the principal or capital sum, as there was no capital or principal sum given by such bequest, owned legally or equitably by or held in trust or otherwise for the testator's daughter, she was not liable to taxation under the statute, and that the investment of the money made by the executors with the consent of the daughter in trust to pay her the income had no effect upon her rights in regard to taxation under such statute. Swett v. Boston, 18 Pick. 123.

XI. Devise to widow.

A widow who takes as devisee in real estate for life is bound to pay one third of the taxes, the estate being chargeable with the other two thirds. Cochran v. Cochran, 2 Desauss. Eq. 521.

If a widow takes a freehold estate under a will as tenant for life she is bound to keep down the taxes. Anderson v. Hensley, 8 Heisk. 834; Whyte v. Nashville, 2 Swan, 364.

So, if she takes as equitable tenant for life she must keep down the taxes. Cadmus v. Combes, 37 N. J. Eq. 264, 266.

Where the will is silent as to the payment of taxes the widow must bear the tax out of the income. Hoff's Appeal, 24 Pa. 200, where the devise to the widow of the interest on a specific sum of stock was held not to be a specific devise of the stock, but only of the interest thereon.

In Waldo v. Cummings, 45 Ill. 421, 425, one third of testator's real estate was devised to his widow during her natural life, with remainder in trust for his children, with a proviso that in case his children should cause their share to be sold for taxes, and the same should not be redeemed, they should forfeit their title to the unredeemed portion. The court held that the language of the will did not prevent the application of the general doctrine which imposed upon the tenant for life the duty of paying taxes, and that therefore the widow was bound to keep down the taxes during the continuance of her estate.

Where a testator bequeathed to his widow the income of a certain sum annually, that sum to be put at interest by the executor and to be equally divided among the children after her decease, it was held that he intended that there should be that sum left at the decease of his widow, and that therefore the income to be given to her would be the net income after deducting the taxes and other expenses. Arnold v. Mower, 49 Me. 561.

In Cadmus v. Combes, supra, the income of real estate and personal property was devised to a wife selection of the lot to be left to my executors, but I request them to give him one of the best." The ten-years' limitation provided for in the will for the division and distribution of the estate expired on February 23, 1893, at which time the plaintiff fully accounted to the probate court for all business and transactions performed by it in behalf of the estate, and said court, on the 13th day of March, 1893, by its decree and judgment duly made and entered in the matter of said estate, duly decreed and adjudged that there was then due and owing to this plaintiff, as such administrator, for taxes, assessments, and other lawful charges, disbursements, and expenses of administration a balance and sum of $16,750.69 over and above all moneys by it then had and received. There was no money or personal property belonging to said estate wherewith the said balance due this administrator could be paid and the devisees and legatees under said will, including this defendant, failed, neglected, and refused to pay said balance, or any part thereof, and by reason thereof no final decree assigning and awarding the said estate to the persons entitled thereto was made, or could be lawfully made, in the matter of said estate in said probate court. By reason of the nonpayment to plaintiff of such balance, it was necessarily compelled, against its wishes, to exercise the duties as such administrator, and upon a subsequent accounting in said probate court it was decreed and adjudged that there was due upon said estate to this plaintiff, as such administrator, the sum of $20,143.02, and that there was not, and is not now, any money or personal property belonging to said estate in the hands of this administrator, and that there is no real property belonging to said estate except one small house or shanty, the rents whereof were and are nominal, and do not exceed the sum of $60 per annum, and except the homestead tract, which consists of 30 acres and $\frac{36}{100}$ of an acre, particularly described in the plaintiff's complaint, and of which the testator died seised in fee, and at which time there were valuable tenements, improvements, fences, and buildings, to wit, a dwelling house, barn, and outhouses thereon, and which premises, prior to the time of his decease, were occupied by the testator and his wife as a homestead, and which premises the defendant, as the widow of the testator, continued to hold as a homestead until about the 10th day of March, 1891, at which time she removed from said homestead to another dwelling house in the county of Ramsey, where she has ever since continuously resided, and occupied the same as her homestead, having rented her first-described homestead to tenants not members of her family, and received the rents and income therefrom, but has wholly failed and neglected to pay the taxes assessed thereon, amounting to the sum of $2,507.04, for the years 1885 to 1890, inclusive, which plaintiff, as such administrator, was compelled to pay to save said homestead from tax sale for taxes, penalties, costs, charges, and expenses; said taxes having been so paid also under the order and authority of the probate court of Ramsey county, and at the request of the reversioners. The unpaid taxes, costs, and penalties upon said homestead now due for the years 1891 to 1894, inclusive, amount to $2,221.91, which have not been paid by this plaintiff for want of funds. The defendant has also, ever since she became entitled to the right and use of said premises as a homestead, refused and ne-for life with power to the executors at their discretion to sell the real estate or any part of it. It was held that the personal estate was liable to the payment of the taxes upon the real estate no portion of which could be sold for that purpose.

In Sillcocks v. Sillcocks, 50 N. J. Eq. 25, the residue of the estate was given to a widow "for the full term of her natural life" and at the termination of such estate three specific legacies were given out of the sale, the will providing, "and all the rest and residue of my estate then remaining, that is after the death of my said wife, I give in three equal parts and shares," it was held that the wife, who held possession of the premises, was liable to pay the annual municipal taxes assessed upon it.

Where a testator gave to his wife the use and income of certain real and personal estate, and also the interest of a certain sum of money to be invested on a bond and mortgage, it was held that the taxes, expenses, and commissions were not chargeable upon the estate generally, but that the bequest must bear its own burden, and she was therefore chargeable with the taxes, which were to be paid out of her income. Pinckney v. Pinckney, 1 Bradf. 269.

In Stillwell v. Doughty, 2 Bradf. 311, a widow was entitled to the clear income of real estate, and the assessment was levied thereon for permanent improvements. It was held that the annual interest on the improvements was to be borne by the tenant for life, but that the principal was properly charged against the remainderman.

In the case of a devise to a wife "free and clear of all encumbrances," the will containing a direction for the sale of the property in case the wife desired it, and that the proceeds should be invested, giving her the interest and dividends thereof for life, it was held that the current taxes and assessments were not chargeable upon the testator's general estate. Lawrence v. Holden, 3 Bradf. 142.

Where the words used in the will were merely "free from the debts, interference, or control of any other person whatever," it was held that it only meant that it was the income after payment of the proper charges, which was to be paid to the widow for her separate use, and therefore the phraseology of the will could not be taken to change or affect the ordinary rule of apportionment of assessments for local improvements, which were of a permanent benefit to the property. Re Miller, Tucker, 346, 348.

In Deraismes v. Deraismes, 72 N. Y. 154, the testater devised to his wife a farm together with a dwelling house and buildings thereon, and all his real estate in a certain town for the term of her natural life, stating that he made such devise "to my said wife for a home for herself and my infant children, but my intent is nevertheless that the same shall be, at all times during said term, wholly subject to her will and control," the will containing express provision for the payment of taxes in regard to other property therein devised. It was held that the widow was bound to pay the taxes upon the property so devised as a home.

Where the testator directed that his wife should "receive all the income from my estate during her life, arising as well from the rest and residue bequeathed, as from any sums set apart to pay the legacies provided for in the . . . items of my will" it was held that the expression "all the income" was not to be construed as meaning that the glected to keep the buildings, fences, and other improvements thereon situated in proper repair, and has suffered the same to become dilapidated and out of repair. The plaintiff paid said taxes upon the said estate at the written request of all persons interested therein except this defendant, first exhausting all rentals received from other premises for such purpose, and made the advances to save such estate. The reasonable market value of said homestead does not exceed $23,100, and in the present condition of the real-estate market it would not sell for a sum exceeding $10,000; and the defendant, while having ample means outside of said homestead to pay the taxes thereon and keep the same in repair, refuses and neglects to do so. The defendant still collects the rental from said homestead, which is continually depreciating in value, and is not adequate security for the taxes paid and unpaid thereon. The relief asked is for an accounting; that the value of defendant's life estate in the premises be ascertained; that a receiver be appointed of said premises; that the defendant be enjoined from leasing or collecting rents from said homestead; that her life estate be adjudged terminated, or her homestead right adjudged forfeited; and that the names of persons now in possession as tenants be disclosed, that they may be made parties therein. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint upon three grounds: (1) That the plaintiff had not the legal capacity to sue; (2) that several causes of action are improperly united; (3) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the facts alleged in the complaint do not show that the plaintiff is entitled to the reversion of the real estate so as to entitle it to an eviction, and because the facts pleaded do not show that the plaintiff is a creditor of the defendant, and that the facts pleaded as an abandonment do not operate as such in favor of the plaintiff.

The facts pleaded, however, do show the very strongest grounds for equitable relief. We regard the certain persons named as beneficiaries in the tenth subdivision of the will as reversioners, within the legal or equitable definition of that term. But we do not consider the abandonment of the homestead by the defendant, and her subsequent acquirement of another, at all material. She had only a life estate in the premises, and it was therefore her duty to pay all taxes properly assessed against them. This she refused or neglected to do. Upon the death of John Jones, the executor, this plaintiff was appointed administrator with the will annexed of the estate not administered. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4453, provides that the term "executor" in this Code shall be construed to include an administrator with the will annexed. Referring again to the tenth subdivision of the will, we find that it was the duty of the executor to take charge of all the rest, residue, and remainder of the testator's property not specifically devised, collect the rents, pay all taxes, assessments, and charges thereon, and make report to the probate court of Ramsey county at least once a year. The duties of the administrator in this respect were those of a trustee, and, whatever plaintiff did in this respect in regard to paying taxes upon the homestead, it was not that of a volunteer, but performing a duty speciftestator by it indicated an intention that his wife should have the gross, income of the estate, and she was therefore held liable for the taxes. Re Shipman, 82 Hun, 108.

In Parkinson v. Parkinson, 2 Bradf. 77, testator gave his wife the use, "for three years, of his house in a certain street," free to occupy or to let as she may prefer. At the expiration of that period he directed the property to be sold by his executors and the proceeds to be divided between his two sons, and the question was, Who should pay the taxes, the will being silent on that point? The court held that the tenant was bound to keep down the accruing charges on the property where he took by gift and not by contract, and that the person enjoying the present use and possession of the property should keep the estate clear of such burdens as arise from the ordinary annual taxes, and not throw them upon the reversioner.

In Re Archer's Estate, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1041, a testator devised and bequeathed all his property, real and personal, to his executors "in trust to receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof for and during the life of [his widow], and apply the same to the use of" certain persons therein mentioned, namely his wife and three sons, with a proviso that if two of his sons and his wife desired to reside in the dwelling house, they should occupy the same without paying rent during the lifetime of the widow, each paying a third of the actual living expenses of the household. The court held that the estate being devised in trust, the executors holding the legal title with a duty of maintaining and protecting the same during the widow's lifetime, it was their duty to receive the rent, income, and profits, and to pay and discharge the taxes, and therefore that the taxes should be paid by the executors out of the income of the estate, the estate devised to the widow and sons not being analogous to a life estate.

Where a residuary estate was devised in trust to pay the rents "to the sole use" of a widow for life, the same being also charged with legacies payable after her decease out of capital, the widow to have the use of testator's farm during her life, the trustee to "pay out of his estate all taxes" on said farm, and the trustees paid the same from income, which payments were objected to by the executors of the widow upon the ground that they ought to be payable out of capital, it was held that the words, "pay out of my estate," were not sufficient to support the construction contended for, for the reason that the other provisions of the will showed an intention to preserve the corpus intact for ultimate disposition upon the death of the life tenant, and in order that the will might be so construed it should contain words most unmistakably pointing in that direction. Re Albertson, 113 N. Y. 434.

And when the use and occupation of a dwelling house were devised to a widow during widowhood, and the testator expressed a desire that, if agreeable to her, her daughter should occupy one room and her son another in the house, it was held that the widow was the owner of the freehold and must keep down the taxes. Anderson v. Hensley, 8 Heisk. 834.

Where by the terms of a will the executors invested money on bond and mortgage conditioned for the payment of the interest to the widow dur-ically enjoined by the terms of the will itself. When the defendant refused or neglected to pay the taxes for years upon the homestead, and there was danger of the premises being thereby lost to the reversioners, the homestead fell within the provision in the will, viz., "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate," which it was plaintiff's duty to save if the life tenant was guilty of not paying the taxes thereon. The reversioners were under no obligations to pay taxes, nor protect the property as against waste by reason of nonrepairs, so far as concerned the life estate of the defendant. That was the duty of the defendant herself, for the law is too well settled to need discussion that a tenant for life of real estate is compelled to pay taxes and the expense of repairs out of the rents and profits, whether such life estate comes by will, conveyance, or operation of law, unless the life tenant voluntarily pays them out of other funds. In this case, if the life tenancy ceased by reason of the death of the defendant or otherwise, the reversioners would be entitled to take the fee, unless, after the death of the testator's nephews, William Mintzer and George Hicks, subject to the right of the trustee to sell the premises, and divide the proceeds among the nephews and nieces of the testator, as specifically provided by the terms of the will. Of course, a power may be granted by devise in a last will and testament. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4334. And the trust conferred by the terms of the will upon the executor was valid as a power, and, this being so, the acceptance of the trust made the duty of the trustee co-ordinate with the power conferred. One of the duties or trusts expressly enjoined by the will was that the executor should collect the rents and pay taxes, and, the plaintiff having been duly substituted in place of the executor as administrator with the will annexed, it was its duty to use due diligence in this matter. 2 Perry, Tr. § 527. The power of an administrator with the will annexed to perform the duty conferred upon the executor by the terms of the will is expressly authorized by Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4464, viz.: "To perform every act and discharge every trust as the executor named in the will would have had, and their acts shall be as valid and effectual for every purpose." The right of the plaintiff to be reimbursed out of the life estate does not rest upon the fact that she has abandoned it as a homestead, but upon the broader ground that, she having failed to pay the taxes thereon, and not kept the same in repair, and thereby allowed it to depreciate in value, with great danger of entire loss to the reversioners, it became the duty of the plaintiff, under the terms of the will, to discharge this duty, and for the expense so incurred it is entitled to be reimbursed out of the life estate. These taxes were paid at the request of all of the reversioners, and with the approval of the probate court; and while these facts do not constitute plaintiff's authority for so doing, they materially aid in showing its good faith. Therefore, assuming that it was the duty of the life tenant to keep down the taxes, and to keep the premises in such repair, and also preserve the property from decay to the extent, at least, of the rental value of the premises, and she having neglected and refused to do so, the plaintiff is entitled to have a receiver appointed to collect the rents sufficient in amount to discharge the liabilities of the life tenant's estate for which she is answerable. Murch v. J. O. Smith Mfg. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 193; Cairns v. Chabert, 3 Edw. Ch. 313. In the latter case a bill in equity was sustained against the life tenant to restrain the disposition of property, and to compel the tenant to keep down assessing her life, the principal to be paid to the executors at her death and to be distributed according to the will, it was held that the executors were taxable at the present value of the principal. State, Wyckoff, v. Jones, 39 N. J. L. 650.

In Stone v. Littlefield, 151 Mass. 485, a trustee, who received from his predecessor as part of the trust estate a note secured by a mortgage of real estate, foreclosed such mortgage for nonpayment of interest, taxes, and the principal sum, and the question was whether the taxes should be deducted from the principal, or be taken from the income of other and productive investments in the same trust estate, the testator's widow being entitled to the use and income of all the residue. The court held that such payments were to be deducted from the principal, otherwise a loss upon some one investment for which one would be legally responsible might absorb the widow's whole income for a year, or even more, it being more just that such a loss should be held to diminish the corpus of the trust estate so that the tenant for life would receive less income and the remaindermen less principal.

In Bidwall v. Greenshield, 2 Abb. N. C. 427, a testator gave and devised to his wife all his real estate to be used, occupied, and enjoyed by her for a term of years from and after the date of his will, with remainder in fee to his children to be equally divided between them, and the widow continued in possession of the premises but dower was never assigned to her, and the children continued to live with her even after the expiration of the term mentioned in the will. It was held upon proceedings for partition, that the widow's dower interest was liable for the taxes which accrued during the continuance of the term, but that with regard to subsequent taxes they were to be paid out of the fund.

Where a testator gave his wife an annuity to be paid half yearly out of his estate, with a direction to his executors to retain in their hands and keep invested, a sum sufficient to pay the same, it was held that they were bound to invest sufficient to pay such annuity clear of all taxes and commissions. Ex parte McComb, 4 Bradf. 151.

In Re Cushing, 58 Vt. 393, testator directed "the whole interest and income of $6,000 to be paid to [his wife] each and every year during her life," and also that so much of the mentioned sum itself as should be required to support her in a manner becoming her station in life if "said interest and income" were not sufficient, should be so applied, and further provided that his personal estate should be sold and his real estate either sold or rented for the purpose of raising "funds to pay debts, legacies, and expenses." It was held that the income and interest of the widow were not chargeable with taxes or expenses, the testator's intention being clearly to give the widow the whole of the interest and income of the $6,000, during her life for her support without deduction of taxation or expenses.

ments and taxes; and upon motion an order was entered for the appointment of a receiver of so much of the rents and income of the estate as should be necessary to pay off the taxes in arrear, unless within forty days from the service of a copy of the order the tenant should show to the satisfaction of the master that the taxes had been paid. This case is cited with approval in Phelan v. Boylan, 25 Wis. 679. If the life tenant permits the premises to decay for want of repair, and neglects to pay the taxes, subjecting the estate to sale therefor, with accumulated costs and penalties, it must diminish the value of the estate, and thus there is a resulting, lasting damage to the freehold or inheritance, and this constitutes waste. Stetson v. Day, 51 Me. 434; Phelan v. Boylan, 25 Wis. 679; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 140. But, although the defendant has been guilty of permissive waste, we do not think that it is such waste as would constitute an absolute forfeiture of the estate, and therefore the action does not come within the provisions of Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 5882, 5883. But the facts alleged constitute substantial ground for relief in equity, and entitle the plaintiff to protect the inheritance, and, if possible, have it restored to the condition it would be in if the defendant had not been guilty of wrongdoing.

Our conclusion is that, while the plaintiff is not a remainderman or reversioner, so as to entitle it to maintain a common-law action of waste, yet it is entitled to maintain this action for equitable relief; to have a receiver appointed, as prayed for in the complaint; to have an accounting of all rentals received by defendant and taxes paid by plaintiff, as well as the amount of unpaid taxes ascertained, and of the amount necessary to make repairs to save the property from loss to the reversioners; and that, if the same, with necessary expenses, are not paid by the defendant within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the trial court, the life estate of the defendant in the homestead premises described in the complaint may be sold by decree and judgment of the trial court to reimburse the plaintiff for all such necessary disbursements, and to pay the unpaid taxes on said premises and keep them in repair, and to have an injunction against defendant that she be restrained from collecting any more rentals of the premises until the further order therein of the trial court.

The order sustaining the demurrer is overruled, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to proceed in the matter not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas (No. 1) for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for defendants' alleged wrongful retention and copying of trade secrets from books belonging to plaintiff. Reversed.

Plaintiff was employed by defendants, carpet manufacturers, as color mixer in their mills for a period of nearly twenty years. At the time of entering their employment he brought with him certain books containing recipes for the mixing of colors, and in these books he entered the formula for mixing the various colors which he prepared for making the designs in the carpets which were manufactured by defendants during his employment by them. When he was about to leave their employment defendants forcibly took possession of these formula books and made copies of them, after which they returned his books to him. Defendants claimed that they furnished books to plaintiff for the purpose of having these formula entered in them to be preserved for the use of the mill, and that because of plaintiff's failure to make the copies they were entitled to make them themselves. Plaintiff, on the contrary, claimed that the formula belonged to him and not to the mill and that he was not obliged to enter them in the books of the mill or to give defendants the benefit of them after he severed his connection with the mill.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants are extensively engaged in the manufacture of carpets. The value of their products in the market, and the demand for them by purchasers, depend largely upon the artistic character of the patterns or designs upon which they are made, and the harmony and general effect of the shades of color by which they are brought out. The designs are prepared by persons employed for that special purpose. When a new design has been made and adopted by the manufacturers, it is sent to the color room, which is in charge of a color mixer. The duty of the color mixer is to prepare the dyes or colors, so as to reproduce in the carpet all the shades indicated by the design. He submits the results of his work to the designer. When approved, it becomes his duty to enter, in a book kept for that purpose, and called a "color book," the number of the carpet, and the formula by which each shade of color used in its manufacture is produced. He is also required to keep a book, in which a piece of yarn, colored according to the formula, for each shade in the carpet, is preserved, with the number of the carpet to which the shades belong. This is known as the "shade book." When the manufacture of this particular carpet is about to be begun, the color mixer prepares the colors for actual use. When mixed and ready for use, they are put into large pitchers, and on each pitcher is put a label, with the formula or recipe by which the color it contains was prepared, together with the number of the carpet upon which it is used. So that, when a pitcher is emptied, it can be refilled, by any of the employees about the color room, by following the recipe appearing on the label. The designer and the color mixer, like the printer and the weaver, are employed and their wages adjusted with reference to their skill and experience in the department of work to which they are assigned. They are not independent contractors, producing designs or shades of color by a secret process of their own, which they sell, as patterns or colors, to the manufacturer, for a fixed price; but they are employees bringing their skill and experience, in the use of the materials furnished by their employer, into his service, for his benefit in the production of his goods. The designs and receipes so made for him are, as between his employees and himself, his, for the purposes of his own manufacturing business. Even if his employee had obtained letters patent for his formula, protecting himself thereby against the public, still the employer's right to continue its use would be protected by the United States courts. Solomons v. United States, 137 U. S. 342, 34 L. ed. 667. The same conclusion was reached by this court in Slemmer's Appeal, 58 Pa. 155, 98 Am. Dec. 248, where we said: "If one employed by another, whilst receiving wages, experiments at the expense of his employer, constructs an invention and permits his employer to use it, without compensation paid or demanded, and then obtains a patent, a license to the employer to use the patent will be presumed." But this case is much stronger than that of one who obtains a patent, as in Slemmer's Case, for here the experiments resulting in the receipes were not only made at the expense of the employer, but for him, and with a view to the immediate use of their results in his business. It was the sole and only purpose for which the color mixer was employed and paid. In the manufacture of carpets, the spinning of the yarn is no more a part of the process than is the preparation of the colors to be made use of in working out the pattern. The fact is that the spinner and the weaver, the color mixer and the printer who uses the colors, are all alike in their relation to their common employer. The labors of all are necessary to the production of a carpet, and the results of the labor of all belong to the employer, who pays for the labor. The receipes prepared by the color mixer, for the use of his employers in the manufacture of their carpets, belonged to them, so far, at least, as to give them the right to continue the use of the various colors and shades produced by them. The plaintiff had a right, if he chose so to do, to preserve them for his own use in the future; but his right was not an exclusive one. It was his duty, by virtue of his employment, and by reason of the relation his work bore to his employers' business, to enter all these recipes in his employers' color book; for none of the patterns of carpet manufactured during the twenty years of the plaintiff's service could be reproduced without the use of the same recipes, for the preparation of the colors to be employed, that had been used when the pattern was first produced. This duty, to put it in the mildest form, the plaintiff had improperly neglected. His employers were left under the belief that their color books had been used, and that the books he was attempting to carry away were, in every sense of the word, their own property. Had this been true, their conduct in requiring him to leave them in the mill would have given the plaintiff no cause of action. In respect to this subject the mistake under which they labored was due to the plaintiff's failure in duty as an employee. He had pushed the blanks furnished to him to one side, and had used only his own, and had left his employer in ignorance of his conduct. Now, let it be conceded that the books he was attempting to carry away were his own. It is, nevertheless, true that they contained the only record of the recipes used in the mill for twenty years, and that these recipes were a part of the stock in trade of his employers. Not, perhaps, the particular copy of them which the plaintiff had entered in his own books, but the processes and combinations they represented, belonged, for the purposes of their business, to them; and, as between him and them, they had a right to some record or register of recipes.

If the plaintiff had a right to recover in this action, because of the ownership of the books in which the recipes had been entered, and the manner of their detention, when he attempted to take them away, the jury should have been instructed that the value of the recipes was not to be considered in estimating the damages. As between these parties, as we have already said, the plaintiff had no exclusive right to them. It was his duty, as a color mixer, to enter each formula in his employers' books. They had a clear legal right to the knowledge which such a record would afford them, and the copies they have made from his books should have been made for them by the plaintiff as the several colors were compounded during his long term of service. The plaintiff's claim for damages must rest on the fact that he owned the books that were kept from him. In addition to this, anything in the manner of the detention that shows unnecessary violence or disregard for the sensibilities or the self-respect of the plaintiff may be considered. But the jury should be told, in this connection, that they should also consider the conduct of the plaintiff,—his disregard of his duty and his instructions in making no entries in his employer's color books,—his failure to disclose this fact to them, and leaving them under the honest belief that he was removing from their mill their own color books.

The portions of the charge embraced in the fifth, sixth, and seventh assignments of error, if stated as abstract propositions, would be unobjectionable; but, as applicable to the facts of this case, they were, in the view we have taken of this case, misleading. The plaintiff does not seem to have suffered any special inconvenience or injury because of the detention of his books, and he has no right to complain that the defendants are now in possession of one list or register of their own recipes. They are entitled to such a register, and it should have been made for them by the plaintiff. If he had discharged his whole duty as an employee, the misunderstanding which led to the detention of his books could not have occurred, and this litigation would never had arisen.

The first assignment must also be sustained. The letter written after the plaintiff's color books had been returned to him, demanding that the copy that had been made should be given up to him was inadmissible. It was an argumentative presentation of his view of his rights as an employee, and of the grievance of which he complained. It was unanswered. It was the declaration of the plaintiff in his own behalf, and was no more admissible because reduced to writing than it would have been if delivered orally. The point is substantially ruled in Fraley v. Bispham, 10 Pa. 320, 51 Am. Dec. 486.

The judgment is reversed, for the reasons now given, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

APPEAL by defendant from orders of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Beaufort County refusing to set aside a service of summons upon defendant, a foreign corporation, and from judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Elliott & Elliott for appellant.

Mr. Thomas Talbird, for respondent:

The affidavit would have to show that the defendant company had no officer or agent in the state upon whom process could be served before plaintiff could get an order of publication. Such an affidavit could not truthfully be made for the reason that W. C. Brown was at the time living in the town of Beaufort and was an officer upon whom, under the statute, process could be served.

The corporation under the law is a person. W. C. Brown is another person. The corporation can only act through agents; he was one of its agents. Under the state law he was the proper person upon whom to serve process issued against the corporation, and the sheriff thereupon served him, not in his individual capacity, but as treasurer of the corporation.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two cases were heard together, but, while the principles upon which they depend are similar, the facts are not identical in the two cases, and hence it will be more convenient to consider them separately.

In the first-named case, the plaintiff, who resides in the city of New York, by a formally executed power, constituted William C. Brown, a resident of this state, her attorney in fact to commence this action and to take all necessary steps to obtain a warrant of attachment against the property of the defendant company, which is a foreign corporation, doing business in the town of Beaufort, S. C. In pursuance of this power, the said W. C. Brown, on the 30th day of July, 1895, procured a summons and complaint to be issued in the name of the plaintiff against the defendant company, on a certain note alleged to have been executed by the defendant company in favor of the plaintiff, and on the same day sued out a warrant of attachment, which was levied upon the property of the defendant company, upon the ground that it was a foreign corporation, the power of attorney having been filed before the warrant of attachment was issued. The sheriff returned that he had "served on the above named, the American Ginning Company, the summons and complaint in the action, by delivering copies thereof to W. C. Brown, treasurer, personally, and leaving the same with him." On the 11th of September, 1895, Messrs. Elliott & Elliott, signing themselves "Defendant's Attorneys for the Purpose of This Motion Only," served a notice on Mr. Talbird, as plaintiff's attorney, in which it was expressly stated that they appeared only for the purpose of this motion; that they would move before his honor, Judge Buchanan, at a specified time and place, "to set aside the service of the summons and complaint in this action, upon the grounds: (1) Because the affidavit upon which the attachment was issued was sworn to before the plaintiff's attorney, and the justification of the sureties on the undertaking was made before him; (2) that the service of the summons was irregular, in that it was made on the attorney in fact of the plaintiff, who acted for plaintiff in procuring the issue of the writ of attachment as manager of the defendant corporation." It was admitted at the hearing of this motion "that William C. Brown, upon whom the summons and complaint were served, was the same William C Brown who was the attorney in fact of the plaintiff." The motion was refused by Judge Buchanan, and he, on the same day, rendered judgment by default against the defendant company. From this judgment, as well as from the refusal of the motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, and to discharge the attachment, defendant appeals, upon the following ground: "Because the service of the summons upon William C. Brown, as an officer of the defendant corporation, he being at the same time the attorney in fact of the plaintiff for the commencement and prosecution of the action, was not a sufficient service of the summons upon the corporation."

If, as distinctly appears in the "case," William C. Brown was acting as attorney in fact of the plaintiff in commencing this action and suing out the warrant of attachment, he was pro hac vice the plaintiff, and therefore the service upon him was practically the same as if the papers had been served upon the plaintiff in her own proper person; for under the express terms of the power of attorney, set out in the case, he, in commencing this action, was acting in the "name, place, and stead" of the plaintiff, and for her, and in her name, he signed, sealed, acknowledged, and delivered "any and all necessary instruments, undertakings, and other writings" for the purpose of attaching the property of the defendant company. The fact that he was the treasurer of the defendant corporation cannot affect the question, for, when he undertook, as the attorney in fact of the plaintiff, to commence this action, he necessarily abandoned, for the time and occasion at least, his position as an officer or agent of the defendant company; for the two positions then became entirely inconsistent and incompatible, involving different and conflicting rights and duties.

The question, then, resolves itself into an inquiry whether a person can legally commence an action against a foreign corporation, of which he happens to be an officer or agent, by serving himself with the process or summons necessary to commence such action So far as we are informed, there is no authority in this state upon the point, and we do not think any is needed, to show that such a proposition, so utterly at variance with any proper conception of the due and orderly administration of justice, cannot for a moment be entertained. To concede such a proposition would open the door to the grossest fraud, which would be a reproach to the administration of justice. Of course, we do not mean to intimate that any fraud was intended in this particular case; but we cannot assent to a proposition which, if established, would afford such an easy mode of perpetrating frauds. Counsel for appellant has, however, cited us to two cases from other states which seem to support fully the view which we have adopted. Buck v. Ashuelot Mfg. Co. 4 Allen, 357; Rehm v. German Ins. & Sav. Inst. 125 Ind. 135.

We think, therefore, that the circuit judge erred in refusing the motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint in this action, and, consequently, that he erred in refusing to vacate the attachment, as well as in rendering judgment for the plaintiff.

In the second case above stated, the plaintiff, W. C. Brown, undertook to commence an action against the defendant company to recover the amount due on two notes which he claimed to hold against said company, by having himself, as treasurer of said company, personally served with copies of the summons and complaint, and, on the same day, procuring a warrant of attachment to be issued, which was levied upon the property of said company. A similar notice of motion was made, in a similar manner, to set aside the service of the summons and complaint and to vacate the attachment. Judge Buchanan granted an order refusing to set aside the service and complaint, but granted the motion to discharge the attachment, and, on the same day, rendered judgment by default in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant. From this judgment, as well as from so much of the order as refused the motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, defendant appeals, upon the ground that the service upon said Brown, as an officer of the defendant corporation, he being the plaintiff in the action, was not a sufficient service upon said corporation.

It does not appear from the case as prepared for argument here upon what ground the circuit judge granted the motion to vacate the attachment, and at the same time refused the motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, but, as there is no appeal from so much of the order as vacated the attachment, we need not consider that matter further. For the reasons given in considering the appeal in the first case, we think that the circuit judge erred in refusing the motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint in this case; and, that being so, it follows that he erred in rendering judgment against a party who had not been properly made a party by legal service of a summons.

The judgment of this court is that, in the case first above stated, the order of the circuit judge refusing the motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, and to vacate the attachment, and rendering judgment therein, be reversed; and, in the second case above stated, the judgment of this court is that so much of the order of the circuit judge as refused the motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, as well as the judgment rendered in the second case, be reversed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT

Re ESTATE OF William A. WAGONER.

APPEAL OF Frances S. DORLAN.

(174 Pa. 558.)

1. A gift made by a bond of the donor including a warrant of attorney for confession of judgment, when delivered to a third person to be held until the donor's death and then given to the donee, who is informed of the arrangement, constitutes a valid gift to the custodian as trustee, although he by mistake made the bond to bear interest during the donor's life, and this blunder was remedied by his indorsing the interest on the instrument without any payment thereof by the donor's direction.

2. In the absence of any reservation in a trust to deliver a bond to a donee upon the donor's death, the secret intention of the donor that it shall be redelivered to him if he survives the donee, and the fact that the trustee would have redelivered it in such case, will not make the gift subject to such a contingency as will defeat it.

APPEAL by claimant from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Chester County confirming the report of a master appointed for the distribution of the estate of William A. Wagoner deceased, which disallowed her claim for the amount of a bond in her favor which had been executed by the testator in his lifetime and deposited with a third person for her benefit. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Carroll Hayes and William M. Hayes, for appellant:

The $2,000 bond was not a mere gratuity, but was the evidence of a debt, and the technical rules as to the delivery of a gift have no application to this case.

A bond, like a check, is presumed to be in payment of a debt or for services rendered.

The transaction, then, was not a gift, but a trust founded upon a valuable consideration. The strict rules as to gifts have no application. It then becomes a contract which the court will enforce.

Bispham, Eq. 100.

Any words which indicate with sufficient certainty a purpose to create a trust will be effective in so doing. It is not necessary that the words "trust" and "trustee" should be used.

The true point to consider is not whether decedent might have recalled or revoked the bond, but that he did not in fact do so.

The decedent's direction to mark the interest as paid, each first of April, amounts to the same as a reservation of the interest of the money for his own use during his life. Such reservations are frequently found in valid declarations of trust.

Even if there were no consideration for the bond, the seal would import a consideration, and the transaction even if held to be executory, will be supported on this ground.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

William A. Wagoner, on the first of April, 1893, being possessed of a considerable estate, both personal and real, died intestate, unmarried, and without issue. There were many collateral relatives, among them a niece, Frances S. Dorlan, this appellant. She had lived in the house of her uncle thirty years; the fifteen preceding his death she was the only member of his family. During the last years of his life, she did the household work, and much other, such as taking care of cows, milking, churning, cleaning stables, and working the garden. About October, 1891, the decedent called on John H. Skiles, a justice of the peace, and asked him to prepare a deed from him to Frances for thirty-two acres of his land. Skiles suggested she might not want the land, and that a severance of this quantity might spoil the farm. He designated a will as the best method of carrying out his purpose towards his niece. The uncle said he would think about it, and left. In about six months, he called again on Skiles, and executed in favor of his niece a bond, dated April 1, 1891, in the sum of $2,000, payable to her absolutely in one year, with interest at rate of 5 per cent, to which was appended the usual warrant of attorney for confession of judgment. This bond, after formal execution, he handed to 'Squire Skiles, to be by him safely kept, and delivered to Frances after his death. Skiles suggested to him that the bond would draw interest during his life, and Wagoner said he, Skiles, should mark the interest as paid on the 1st day of April of each year. On the 1st day of April, 1892, he did indorse the interest as paid for the preceding year. Some time after the bond had been deposited with Skiles, the uncle told his niece that "there was a bond of $2,000 at 'Squire Skiles,' and (she) was to leave it there as long as he lived, and at his death (she) was to go and get it." In a few days after his death she called for the bond, and Skiles gave it to her.

The administrator having filed his account of the personalty, showing a balance, an auditor was appointed to distribute. The niece presented the bond as a debt against her uncle's estate. The other collateral heirs resisted her claim. The auditor, on the facts as stated, was of the opinion (1) there was no actual delivery of the bond to the niece; (2) the deposit of the bond with Skiles was not in trust for her, because the evidence did not show the uncle had parted with his dominion over it. He therefore declined to allow her claim on the bond. She also, evidently in anticipation of an adverse decision in this particular, made a claim for wages for six years preceding her uncle's death on a quantum meruit. This, also, the auditor disallowed, because, as the evidence showed, she had been regularly paid at the rate of $50 per year, and, settlements having been made on this basis, there was no implied promise to pay more. In this particular, he was clearly right. Having made his report, and exceptions being filed thereto, the orphan's court overruled the exceptions, and confirmed the report absolutely. From that decree, we have this appeal.

All the errors assigned are resolved by the answer to one question, viz., under the facts, Did a right to the bond pass to the niece? No one will question the correctness, in the abstract, of the legal propositions stated so clearly and concisely by the auditor. "In all gifts a delivery of the thing given is essential to their validity; for although every other step be taken that is essential to the validity of a gift, if there is no delivery, the gift must fail. Intention cannot supply it; words cannot supply it; actions cannot supply it; it is an indispensable requisite, without which the gift fails, regardless of the consequences." Thornton, Gifts & Advancements, § 131. "The consummation of every parol gift is delivery. There must be an actual transmutation of possession and property; and the real question in all such cases is whether the donor has parted with his dominion over it." Id. § 134. On these and like authorities, the auditor concludes there was no gift, for there was no delivery; and, as to the argument that the bond was delivered to Skiles, to be by him held in trust for her, the auditor holds: "Delivery of the property in question, with the intent to give, is absolutely necessary to the validity of the gift. The owner must part with his dominion and control of the thing before the gift can take effect. There must be an actual and positive change of possession. Words of gift are not sufficient. They alone convey no title and are not the basis of any action." 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1314, and other authorities to the same point. The auditor then states the question for his decision thus: "It is clear, from the testimony, that the money represented by the bond for $2,000 was intended by the decedent to be a gift to Frances S. Dorlan, to take effect after his death. The question here raised is whether or not the facts show a sufficient delivery to execute the gift."

It seems to us the undisputed facts found by the auditor do not warrant the inferences drawn from them by him, that the donor had not parted with his control over the bond. Here was an unlearned man disclosing, to one assumed by him to be entirely competent to assist him, his purpose to reward his favored niece by an absolute gift of $2,000, of which she was to come into the full enjoyment at his death. No other reasonable inference can be drawn from Skiles' testimony. The donor first wants to make her an absolute deed for part of the farm; he is deterred from doing this because of Skiles' suggestion that it might depreciate the value of the whole farm. His mind then turns to the execution of his purpose by delivering the bond to Skiles for her. Skiles then draws the bond, and the donor executes it, and places it in Skiles' possession, to be handed her after his death. If the evidence had gone no further, we think no one could question the creation of a trust in Skiles, to be carried into effect on the happening of the contingency of the uncle's death and her survivorship. The uncle placed in the hands of Skiles an obligation for $2,000, to be delivered to the niece at his death, and then notified the beneficiary that he had created the trust, and of the terms of it. Equity would not lend its aid in the creation of a voluntary, intended trust. But this trust was fully created by the donor. All that remained for equity was to enforce it.

One of the facts from which it is assumed the donor still exercised dominion over the bond is that he authorized Skiles to indorse the interest paid during his lifetime; but this, obviously, was the plan suggested by Skiles' mistake in drawing the instrument. Instead of expressing in it the intention of the obligor that it should be payable at his death, he made it payable in one year, with interest at 5 per cent. Then the very difficulty raised by his own blunder he mentions to the obligor, viz., that it will bear interest in his lifetime. Wagoner, no wiser than he, then suggests that the mistake of expressing what was not meant could be cured by indorsing on the instrument what was not true, to wit, that he had paid, annually, the interest. What he did intend he clearly expressed to the scrivener, who wrote what he did not intend; and then was adopted a clumsy device to avoid the effect of the scrivener's mistake. But in all this there was no intention to retain control over the gift,—only an effort to carry out the intention of the giver. But, did the contingency that the gift was not to take effect except in case of the survivorship of the niece render it void? The gift here was to Skiles as trustee, the trust to be executed by the trustee by delivery to the donee at his death. Then the donor informs the niece of the gift, and that at his death she is to go to Skiles and get the bond. The delivery to the trustee for purposes of the trust was absolute. If the niece survived him, the bond was to be delivered to her. If the remote contingency that the aged uncle survived the niece happened, doubtless it was his secret intention, if that contingency occurred to him, the bond should be redelivered to him. But he annexed no such reservation to the trust. He retained no such control or dominion over it in the meantime. The death of either determined only the duty of the trustee. A chancellor, on Skiles' evidence as to what was said by the donor to him when the bond was put in his possession, and the declaration of the donor to the donee, would have restrained Skiles from delivering it to either during the lifetime of both, and, on the death of the niece first, might have ordered its cancelation, but, if the uncle died first, would have compelled its delivery to the niece. Skiles testifies he would have given the bond back to Wagoner if he had asked him for it. That is wholly immaterial. Skiles' duty as a trustee is not measured by what he would have done, but what he ought to have done under the express terms of his trust, with express notice of it to the beneficiary. The delivery to him was a good delivery to her, as is held in Stephens v. Russ, 54 Pa. 20, and Stephens v. Rinehart, 72 Pa. 434. In this last case, deeds for lands had been executed by a grantor and delivered to a third party, to be by him delivered to the grantees after the grantor's death, and they were so delivered. This court (Sharswood, J.), says: "That the delivery of the deed in controversy after the death of the grantor, took effect by relation to the first delivery, seems a point very well settled by the decided cases." Then is quoted, with approval, the opinion in Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Met. 414, 37 Am. Dec. 154: "Where the future delivery is to depend upon the payment of money, or the performance of some other condition, it will be deemed an escrow. Where it is merely to await the lapse of time, or the happening of some contingency, and not the performance of any condition, it will be deemed the grantor's deed presently. Still it will not take effect as a deed until the second delivery; but when thus delivered it will take effect by relation from the first delivery." And other cases to same effect are cited. There is no distinction in this respect between an instrument constituting the evidence of a gift of land and one evidencing a gift of money. In Hummel's Estate, 161 Pa. 215, the donor delivered to a third party three promissory notes under seal, to be delivered to a nephew and niece after his death, all payable after his death. It was held, the present chief justice rendering the opinion, that the delivery was complete as evidence of an existing debt payable in the future, and the gift was irrevocable. In Candor's Appeal, 27 Pa. 119, the decedent executed a bond in $2,000, payable ten years after date, or at his death, to his daughter, and delivered it to a trustee to be handed to her. Although he afterwards undertook to revoke the gift by his will, and died before the expiration of the ten years, this court held the gift irrevocable.

We are clearly of the opinion, that this was an express trust by parol, which took effect as soon as created. The enjoyment of the subject of the trust by the beneficiary could be defeated only on the happening of the one contingency, her death before her uncle's. The subject of it having passed completely out of his control, that control could only be resumed by him on the happening of the same contingency. A subsequent event, his survivorship, might, through the interposition of equity, restore to him the bond, but a change of intention on his part never could.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and it is directed that the fund be distributed in accordance with this opinion.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Elisha GRAY et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
Willard D. MERRIAM.

(148 Ill. 179.)

1. A bank which, according to its custom, receives securities as a special deposit, is liable for any loss thereof occurring through the want of that degree of care which good business men usually exercise in keeping property of such value.
2. An erroneous instruction will not cause a reversal when it affirmatively appears that the defeated party was not injured by the error.
3. A bank holding United States bonds as collateral security is liable for their amount if they are stolen by its employee who has access to them, after the managing officer of the bank knows that he is speculating on the board of trade, and accepts his statement that he is using his own money, without knowledge that he has property other than his salary, which is $1,800 a year.
4. Testimony that bonds stolen from the bank were in its possession as a special deposit, had been left there as collateral to a loan which was repaid, and that the bank officer had access to them for the purpose of cutting off coupons, is admissible upon the question of the liability of the bank for the loss, as tending to show the relation of the parties to each other and to the property.

(November 29, 1893.)

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain bonds which had been left with defendant and stolen by its employee. Affirmed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

The following is a statement of the facts in this case, as made by the appellate court in the opinion rendered by that court:

"This is a suit brought by the defendant in error, Willard D. Merriam, against Elisha Gray, plaintiff in error, and Samuel A. Kean, surviving partners of the firm of Preston, Kean, & Co., to recover the value of fifteen United States 4 per cent bonds for $1,000 each, claimed to have been left with said firm for safe keeping, and lost through the negligence of said firm. The firm of Preston, Kean, & Co. was engaged in the general banking business in Chicago, and Merriam, defendant in error, had for several years prior to 1879 kept a running deposit and check account with them, and had at times borrowed money of them. In February, 1879, Merriam purchased twelve of the lost bonds from, or through the agency of, the firm, and took them to his home in Iowa, and in the spring of the same year purchased, in a like manner, three other like bonds, which he directed the firm to keep for him. In June of the same year he borrowed of the firm $15,000, and sent them the twelve bonds he had at home to hold as collateral security, together with the other three bonds they already held for him. Whatever, if any, other transactions, by way of loans or renewals, may have occurred between the firm and Merriam after that time, and before March, 1881, seem to have been settled, for on March 19 and 24, 1881, the firm wrote Merriam, sending him his canceled notes, and advising him that they 'hold in special deposit, subject to your order, fifteen $1,000 United States 4 per cent

NOTE.—Care required of bank in keeping special deposit.

There are a few cases which were not strictly cases of special deposits, but involved some slight compensation to the bank, and which the courts distinguish from cases of special deposit, and in which they impose a greater liability on that account. While not strictly within the scope of this note, they yet tend to illustrate the limits of the liability, and are therefore mentioned here.

If compensation is offered to the depositary for services rendered in making a loan on the securities deposited, the mere fact that it refuses to take compensation because of the state of accounts between the parties does not make it a gratuitous bailee so as to be liable only for gross negligence. Second Nat. Bank v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 11 Blatchf. 362.

Where a bill which had been forwarded to a bank for collection was lost, the court held that the loss of the bill carried with it the presumption of negligence and want of care; and the burden of rebutting these presumptions was on the bank. Chicopee Bank v. Seventh Nat. Bank, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 641, 19 L. ed. 422. But that case was not strictly a case of special deposit.

If the deposit consists of securities upon which the bank undertakes to collect dividends for compensation, the deposit is not gratuitous, and the bank will be guilty of gross negligence if it leaves them in the uncontrolled and unwitnessed power of the manager, who misappropriates them. Re United Service Co L. R. 6 Ch. 212, Affirming Johnston v. Renton, L. R. 9 Eq. 181.

In case of deposits left as collateral security the expressions as to the care required illustrate the diversity of expression in regard to strictly special deposits.

Deposits left as collateral security for loans demand a higher degree of care than special deposits. Ouderkirk v. Central Nat. Bank, 52 Hun, 1.

If the deposit is made collateral security for a loan, the bank is bound to exercise ordinary care at least, and it does not do so if it leaves the whole management of the bank to one person without even making any examination to determine its condition. Cutting v. Marlor, 78 N. Y. 458.

If the deposit is left as collateral security for a loan the bank is chargeable with the exercise of a high degree of care in its keeping. Ouderkirk v. Central Nat. Bank, 119 N. Y. 263, 270.

In case of collateral security the care and diligence ought to be such as is properly adapted to the preservation and protection of the property, and should be proportioned to the consequences likely to arise from any improvidence on the part of the bank. Third Nat. Bank v. Boyd, 44 Md. 47, 22 Am. Rep. 35.

In case of collateral securities the bank is liable for want of ordinary care and diligence. Scott v. Crews, 2 S. C. N. S. 522.

Of collateral security the bank is bound to take bonds,—say $15,000.' It does not appear that Merriam ever had all or any one of said bonds in his actual possession, or that he ever in fact saw them, or either of them, after that time. He did, however, after that time, borrow small sums of the firm,—twice $500, and once $600,—and a part or all of said bonds were, by the terms of the notes, given by him for the money so borrowed, pledged to the firm as collateral security. The record contains a copy of one of the notes for $500, wherein it is recited that Merriam has 'deposited with them, as collateral, ——— United States bonds.' The three notes last referred to appear to have been made and paid in 1881, and subsequent to March of that year, and it does not appear that, at any time subsequent to the year 1881, Merriam was indebted to the firm for borrowed money, or otherwise. The bonds were stolen by Frederick M. Ker in 1882, while Ker was acting as assistant cashier, or assistant manager, of the firm in its banking business. During the time they were held as a special deposit, the bonds were tied together, and kept in one of the safes in the vault of the bank,—the same safe in which the cash of the bank was kept, but in a separate compartment of the safe,—and Ker, Mr. Kean, the managing partner, and Mr. Ware, the cashier, were the only persons who had access to the safe. The quarterly coupons for interest on the bonds, as they matured, were detached and collected by the firm so long as they remained in their possession, and the amount was credited to the general deposit account of Merriam with them, and was either remitted to him, at his request, in New York exchange, or lay subject to his check in the regular course of the firm's banking business. Merriam was also, in fact, credited with and paid by the firm interest which matured on the bonds January 1, 1883,—a date subsequent to the time when they were taken by Ker. Ker testified that he credited Merriam's account in advance with the amount of the coupons maturing on January 1, 1883, knowing at the time that the bonds were not on hand, so as to anticipate any demand that Merriam might make for the coupons. With reference to the coupons which matured October 1, 1882, at which time, according to the testimony of Ker, it was uncertain whether the bonds were on hand or not, the firm wrote Merriam on October 6, 1882: 'Yours received. We credit $150,—coupons. The bonds give us no trouble at all; glad to be of service to you.' Ker had been in the employ of the firm for many years, and had arisen by regular gradations to the responsible position of assistant cashier, assumed by him in November, 1881. Very shortly afterwards, and in December, 1881, or January, 1882, rumors that Ker was speculating on the board of trade reached Mr. Kean, the active managing partner of the firm, and he spoke with Ker about it. Ker admitted that he had been speculating some, but claimed that, as he was operating with his own money, it was not an objectionable practice. There is some contradiction between the testimony of Kean and that of Ker as to the number of conversations between them on the subject of Ker's speculations, and as to what was said, but we fail to find, in the testimony of either, any forbidding by Kean of further speculations by Ker. The nearest approach to it is in the testimony of Kean that he asked Ker if he did not know it was against the rule, but he fails to state that he made any reply after Ker said he would stop if it was against the wishes of the firm."

The verdict and judgment in the trial court were in favor of the plaintiff, and said judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court.

The instructions given for plaintiff by the trial court are as follows: "The jury are instructed that, if you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants held the bonds of the plaintiff exclusively for the benefit of the plaintiff, then the only obligation resting upon them was to exercise reasonable and ordinary care over the same. What constitutes such reasonable and ordinary care is a question of fact for the jury to determine from all the evidence in the case. It will vary with the nature, value, and situation of the property. The person who holds or has the charge of the property of another under such circumstances is required to exercise the care usually and generally deemed necessary in the community for the security of a similar property under like circumstances, but nothing more. ordinary care only. Jenkins v. National Village Bank, 58 Me. 275.

In regard to deposits held as collateral security, the bank is obliged to exercise that degree of care in their safe keeping which a reasonably prudent and cautious man would exercise in the care of his own property of the same kind. Prather v. Kean, 29 Fed. Rep. 498.

The bank must take the same care of collateral security that good business men or persons of every class ordinarily take of such property. Fleming v. Northampton Nat. Bank, 62 How. Pr. 177.

If the bank does not take any precautions to know whether or not the deposits are safe it will be held liable, at least where the deposit was left as collateral security for loans. Ouderkirk v. Central Nat. Bank, 119 N. Y. 263, 270.

Liability of national banks for loss of special deposit.

Some of the courts at first held that it was beyond the power of a national bank to take a special deposit, and that therefore it could not be held liable for the loss of it.

In Wiley v. First Nat. Bank, 47 Vt. 546, 19 Am. Rep. 122, it is held that national banks have no power to take special deposits, and that therefore they are not liable for the loss of them, and that ruling was followed in Whitney v. First Nat. Bank, 50 Vt. 388, 28 Am. Rep. 503.

But when the latter case came up the second time the court, in view of National Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 25 L. ed. 750, did not adhere to the former decisions but considered the question upon principle, holding that the law required the bank to keep the deposit in good faith, within its safe, with all the safeguards afforded to like property of its own. Whitney v. First Nat. Bank, 55 Vt. 155, 45 Am. Rep. 598.

If a national bank is accustomed to take special deposits, and this is known and acquiesced in by the directors, it will be liable if the deposit is lost by gross negligence. National Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 25 L. ed. 750.

want of ordinary and reasonable care is in law termed 'gross negligence.' It is for you to say what the evidence is,—what it proves, tends to prove, or fails to prove; and the court has no right to, and must not be understood to, intimate any opinion as to any questions of fact. If, from all the evidence, you find and believe that the defendants did not exercise, over the bonds of the plaintiff, reasonable and ordinary care, but were guilty of gross negligence in their keeping, and that by reason thereof the bonds were lost to the plaintiff, then you will find the defendants guilty." "If the jury find the defendants guilty, they should assess the damages of plaintiff at the value of the bonds on the 1st day of December, 1882, and may add interest thereon from the 1st day of January, 1883, to the present time, at the rate of 6 per centum per annum."

The instruction given for the defendant is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence in this case that the bonds in question were held by the defendants and said David Preston simply as a special deposit, and while they were so in the possession of the said defendants and said David Preston they were lost or stolen, then you are instructed to find for the defendants herein, unless you further believe from the evidence that they were guilty of gross carelessness or negligence in the care which they took of them while they held possession thereof."

Messrs. Robert Hervey and C. Stuart Beattie, for defendant in error:

Defendant in error remained a customer of the bank all the time, with a deposit account, showing a balance of something to his credit, until after these securities were taken.

During all this time defendant in error was at liberty to draw upon the bank, and it was willing to honor his drafts; and for any balance of account owing by him to it, while such an understanding existed, it had a lien upon these securities without any special contract.

Fourth Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 68 Ill. 398; Davis v. Bowsher, 5 T. R. 492.

Defendant in error left the bonds with the bank, knowing that he could get money on them whenever he wished, the bank being willing to loan money, with the bonds as collateral, at any time; and while holding them, applying the money derived from the coupons as a general deposit with it by defendant in error. This being true, the bank was a bailee for hire, although the defendant in error had no indebtedness to the bank when the bonds were lost.

Ker's position was one of trust and great importance. His own admission showed that he was not trustworthy for such employment, and it was gross negligence in the defendant not to discharge him or place him in some position of less responsibility.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The main error assigned is the giving of the first instruction given by the trial court for the plaintiff. It is claimed by plaintiff in error that the defendant bankers were gratuitous bailees, holding the bonds in controversy as a special deposit for safe keeping without reward. The general rule is that a gratuitous bailee is liable only for gross negligence. Story, Bailm. 9th ed. §§ 62, 79; Schouler, Bailm. 2d ed. § 35; Skelley v.

A bank which habitually receives special deposits for safe keeping is liable for the value of them if lost through its gross negligence. Chattahoochee Nat. Bank v. Schley, 58 Ga. 369.

But it has been held that if a national bank goes into the hands of a receiver after having lost the deposit by gross negligence, the owner will be entitled only to a ratable dividend with the other creditors of the bank. Turner v. First Nat. Bank, 26 Iowa, 562.

Measure of care required generally.

The theoretical statements as to the measure of care required in keeping a special deposit are quite diverse. They vary all the way from the care supposed to be bestowed by the most inattentive men upon their own property to that exercised by prudent men under like circumstances. One class of cases hold that—

The bank is liable only for the measure of care which the most inattentive and thoughtless men take of their own concerns. First Nat. Bank v. Graham, 79 Pa. 106, 21 Am. Rep. 49; First Nat. Bank v. Rex, 89 Pa. 308, 33 Am. Rep. 767; Steffe v. Bank of Conneautville, 22 Pittsb. L. J. 157, 1 Bright. Dig. (Pa.) 215.

The bank is liable only for gross negligence which in its effect on contracts is equivalent to fraud. Lloyd v. West Branch Bank, 15 Pa. 172, 53 Am. Dec. 581.

In the case of a special deposit slight care is sufficient. Merchants Nat. Bank v. Guilmartin, 88 Ga. 797, 17 L. R. A. 322.

In order to hold the bank liable gross carelessness on its part in some respect, affecting the safe custody of the deposit, or which occasioned its loss, must be shown. Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 99 Mass. 605, 47 Am. Dec. 59.

But it will be noticed that in one case holding the rule of gross carelessness, that rule is very little different from the rule announced in other cases apparently requiring a higher degree of care. It is held that a bank is liable only for gross negligence which is equivalent to bad faith. But it is further stated that the degree of care which is

Kahn, 17 Ill. 170. The instructions for both plaintiff and defendants require the jury to find that the defendants were guilty of gross negligence in the keeping of the bonds, as a condition to the right of recovery. But the objection made to plaintiff's instruction is the definition which it gives of gross negligence in the use of the following clause: "The want of ordinary and reasonable care is in law termed 'gross negligence.'" Gross negligence has been defined to be the absence or want of slight care or diligence. Story, Bailm. §§ 62, 64; Schouler, Bailm. §§ 15, 35; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Carrow, 73 Ill. 348, 24 Am. Rep. 248; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Ill. 512. But the portions of the instruction which precede and follow said clause are in harmony with much of the language used in the text-books and decisions. Schouler, in his recent work on Bailments and Carriers (§ 35), after announcing that the gratuitous bailee is liable only for slight care and diligence according to the circumstances, and cannot be held for loss or injury unless grossly negligent, says: "This statement of the rule, though strongly buttressed upon authority, fails at this day of universal approval in our jurisprudence. . . . 'Slight,' 'ordinary,' and 'great,' are terms they [some courts] wish to see discarded, and they prefer judging of each case by its own complexion." The same author states that, in the main, gross negligence is a question of fact upon all the evidence for the jury, and that what constitutes slight diligence or gross negligence will depend in each case upon a variety of circumstances, such as the occupation, habits, skill, and general character of the bailee, and local custom and business usage. Schouler, Bailm. §§ 49, 50. Story, after stating the rule that, when the bailment is for the sole benefit of the bailor, the law requires only slight diligence on the part of the bailee, subsequently adds that in every case good faith requires a bailee without reward to take reasonable care of the deposit; "and what is reasonable care must materially depend upon the nature, value, and quality of the thing, the circumstances under which it is deposited, and sometimes upon the character and confidence and particular dealings of the parties." Story, Bailm. §§ 23, 63. In Smith v. First Nat. Bank, 99 Mass. 605, which was an action against a bank for the conversion or loss by gross negligence of valuable articles deposited with it as a bailee without hire, the court said: "This was a gratuitous bailment. The defendants are liable only for want of ordinary care." A deposit is a naked bailment of goods to be kept for the bailor without recompense, and to be returned when the bailor shall require it, while a mandate is a bailment of goods without reward, to be carried from place to place, or to have some act performed about them. Story, Bailm. §§ 4, 5. But a mandatary, like a depositary, is said to be bound only to slight diligence, and responsible only for gross neglect. Story, Bailm. § 174. In Skelley v. Kahn, supra, we held that "a mandatary or bailee, who undertakes, without reward, to take care of the pledge, or perform any duty or labor, is required to use in its performance such care as men of common sense and common prudence, however inattentive, ordinarily take of their own affairs, and they will be liable only for bad faith, or gross negligence, which is an omission of that degree of care." The liability of banks, acting as bailees without reward in the care of special deposits has been recently considered in the case of Preston v. Prather, 137 U. S. 604, 34 L. ed. 788, and it was there held that such bailees are bound to exercise such reasonable care as men of common prudence usually bestow for the protection of their own property of a similar character; that the exercise of reasonable care is in all such cases the dictate of good faith; and that the care usually and generally deemed necessary in the community for the security of similar property, under like conditions, would be required of the bailee in such cases, but nothing more. Gross negligence, as applied to gratuitous bailees, is defined in that case to be "nothing more than a failure to bestow the care which the property in its situation demands;" and the court further says: "The omission of the reasonable care required is the negligence which creates the liability; and whether this existed is a question of fact for the jury to determine."

In the light of these more liberal views as to necessary to avoid the imputation of bad faith is measured by the carefulness which the depositary uses toward his own property of similar kind. Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168.

In other cases the care required is stated in somewhat stronger terms, holding to the rule of the ordinarily prudent person.

The bank is not bound to resort to special or extraordinary measures to protect the property of the depositor. The owner can only claim that diligence which a person of common sense, not a specialist or expert in a particular department, should exercise in such department. First Nat. Bank v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 60 N. Y. 278, 19 Am. Rep. 181.

The bank is liable for want of ordinary care, which is the same as gross negligence. Lancaster County Nat. Bank v. Smith, 62 Pa. 47.

The bank must use such care as persons of common prudence in its situation and business usually bestow in the custody and keeping of similar property belonging to themselves. Maury v. Coyle, 34 Md. 235.

If the deposit is gratuitous the only obligation resting on the bank is to exercise over the deposit such reasonable care as men of common prudence would usually bestow for the protection of their own property of a similar character. Gross negligence in such cases is nothing more than a failure to bestow the care which the property in its situation demands. Preston v. Prather, 137 U. S. 604, 34 L. ed. 788.

In that case the court says: "The bank must use such measures as will ordinarily secure the property from burglars outside and from thieves within, and must employ fit men, both in ability and integrity, for the discharge of their duties, and remove those employed whenever found wanting in either of these particulars."

The responsibility must not be so lax as to authorize the omission of any care which is indispensable to the proper security of the thing deposited, which may be reasonably acquired according to the usages of men of business. The depositor is entitled to such security as the course of business between the liabilities of bailees without reward, we think that the clause in question, when considered in connection with the rest of the instructions, could only have been understood by the jury as referring to the want of such ordinary and reasonable care as was designated in the previous part of the instruction; that is to say, the care usually and generally deemed necessary in the community for the security of similar property under like circumstances. The rule that a gratuitous bailee is responsible only for the want of care which is taken by the most inattentive cannot be applied to all cases of bailment without reward. When securities are deposited with banks accustomed to receive such deposits, they are liable for any loss thereof occurring through the want of that degree of care which good business men should exercise in keeping property of such value. First Nat. Bank v. Zent, 39 Ohio St. 105; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 160, 206.

But if it be conceded that the definition of gross negligence in the clause above quoted, even when considered in connection with the balance of the instruction, is technically inaccurate, it does not follow that plaintiff in error is entitled to a reversal of the judgment in this case. A judgment will not be reversed for error in an instruction when it appears affirmatively that the defeated party was not injured by the error. The absence of such injury is clearly manifest when the undisputed evidence establishes the correctness of the verdict, so that, either with or without the erroneous instruction, the verdict could not have been otherwise than it was, and, had it been otherwise, would have been set aside by the court. Hall v. Sroufe, 52 Ill. 421; Burling v. Illinois C. R. Co. 85 Ill. 18; Hubner v. Feige, 90 Ill. 208; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Warner, 108 Ill 538; United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Wilder, 116 Ill. 100; Wheaton v. Hadley, 131 Ill. 640. The defendants in this case did a regular banking business. The plaintiff kept a deposit and check account with them. He borrowed money from them from time to time, and authorized them to hold the bonds in question as collaterals to secure the notes given for such loans. While the bonds were thus held as collaterals, the character of the bailment was changed from a bailment for the exclusive benefit of the bailor to one for the mutual benefit of the bailor and bailee. Preston v. Prather, supra. In ordinary cases of special deposits without reward, the banker has no right to handle or examine the property except so far as its safety may require. But here the bankers had access to the package containing the bonds, and detached the interest coupons when they fell due, and collected the interest and deposited it to the credit of the plaintiff to be checked out by him in the regular course of business. First Nat. Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 25 L. ed. 750; Whitney v. First Nat. Bank, 55 Vt. 154, 45 Am. Rep. 598. Ker, the assistant cashier of the bank, stole the bonds in the summer of 1882. He had access to these bonds, and to the other special deposits kept by the bank in its vault. About a year before he absconded, Kean, the chief officer of the bank, had his attention called to the fact that Ker was speculating upon the Board of Trade in Chicago, and had a conversation upon the subject with him. Ker was not known to have any other property than his salary of $1,800. He was, however, allowed to retain his position in the bank, and no effort was made to verify the truth of the statements made as to his speculations, and no examination was made to ascertain whether he was using moneys which did not belong to him. About two months before he absconded, the subject of his speculations was again called to the attention of the chief officers of the bank through an anonymous communication, and Kean had a second interview with him in relation to his conduct in this regard. "The defendants then entered upon an examination of their books and securities, but made no effort to ascertain whether the special deposits had been disturbed." Preston v. Prather, supra. The facts thus detailed are undisputed, and are established by the evidence of the defendants themselves. In Preston v. Prather, supra, an action was brought in the circuit court of the United States by parties in Missouri, doing business under the firm name of the Nodaway Valley Bank of Maryville, against the same bankers who are defendants in the present suit, to recover the value of the United States bonds held as a special deposit, and stolen by the said Ker about the same time when he appropriated the bonds in con-them and the bank shows to have been mutually intended and expected between them. White v. Commonwealth Nat. Bank, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 234.

A bank is liable for the loss of a special deposit occurring through want of that degree of care which good business men would exercise in keeping property of such value. First Nat. Bank v. Zent, 39 Ohio St. 105.

The bank is required to exercise only such diligence and care in the preservation of the deposits as a reasonably prudent person generally exercises in the care and preservation of his own property of like nature, and good faith in the selection of the agents to whom they are intrusted. Ray v. Bank of Kentucky, 10 Bush, 344.

In case of a special deposit the bank will be liable for want of the ordinary diligence which men of common prudence ordinarily exercise about their own affairs. Giblin v. McMullen, L. R. 2 P. C. 317, 21 L. T. N. S. 214, 17 Week. Rep. 445, 5 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 434.

Some of the cases make the criterion the degree of care which the bank bestows upon its own property of like description.

A depositary is bound to use the same diligence in preserving the deposit that he uses in preserving his own property. Levy v. Pike, 25 La. Ann. 630.

The bank is liable to use, in case of a special deposit, only the same care which it takes of its own funds, and is liable only for gross negligence if it is lost or purloined from it. Marine Bank v. Rushmore, 28 Ill. 463.

With regard to special deposits, neither the bank nor its directors undertake to exercise any greater care in their preservation than that depositor has the reasonable right to suppose is exercised in keeping the bank's property of like description. United Soc. v. Underwood, 9 Bush, 609.

The bank should keep the goods intrusted to it with as much care as it ordinarily keeps its own of the same kind. And it should keep them with such degree of care as is reasonable with reference to the nature of the property and the particular cirtroversy here. The Prather Case was tried by agreement before the Federal circuit judge without a jury, resulting in judgment for the plaintiffs, and was taken afterwards to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the judgment rendered by the circuit judge was affirmed. The evidence in that case established substantially the same facts as are herein set forth. Those facts, which are here undisputed and supported by the testimony of the defendants, were there held by the Federal Supreme Court to constitute such gross negligence as to make the defendants liable for the loss of the bonds; the court saying: "As stated above, the reasonable care which persons should take of property intrusted to them for safe keeping without reward will necessarily vary with its nature, value, and situation, and the bearing of surrounding circumstances upon its security. The business of the bailee will necessarily have some effect upon the nature of the care required of him, as, for example, in the case of bankers and banking institutions, having special arrangements by vaults and other guards, to protect property in their custody. Persons therefore depositing valuable articles with them, expect that such measures will be taken as will ordinarily secure the property from burglars outside and thieves within, and that, whenever ground for suspicion arises an examination will be made by them to see that it has not been abstracted or tampered with; and also that they will employ fit men, both in ability and integrity, for the discharge of their duties, and remove those employed whenever found wanting in either of these particulars. An omission of these measures would in most cases be deemed culpable negligence, so gross as to amount to a breach of good faith, and constitute a fraud upon the depositor. It was this view of the duty of the defendants in this case, who were engaged in business as bankers, and the evidence of their neglect, upon being notified of the speculations in stocks of their assistant cashier who stole the bonds, to make the necessary examination respecting the securities deposited with them, or to remove the speculating cashier, which led the court [below] to its conclusion that they were guilty of gross negligence. . . . In this conclusion we fully concur." Inasmuch as the undisputed facts presented to the jury for their consideration on their trial below have been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States to amount to such gross negligence as will fasten liability upon a gratuitous bailee, we are disposed to hold that the verdict of the jury was right, independently of the error in the instruction, and that it ought not to be disturbed. Scott v. National Bank, 72 Pa. 471, 13 Am. Rep. 711.

It is said that the trial court erred in admitting testimony showing that the bonds had been pledged as collateral security for loans made by the bank to the plaintiff at various times before they were stolen, and that the evidence should have been confined to the character of the bailment at the time of the loss, in the summer or fall of 1882, as at the latter date all previous loans for the security of which the bonds had been pledged had been paid up, and they were then held merely as a special deposit. We think that this testimony, as well as that showing that Ker had access to the bonds for the purpose of cutting the quarterly coupons therefrom as late as October, 1882, after some of them had been abstracted, was competent to show the relation of the parties to each other and to the property. As the reasonable care which the defendants were required to take of the bonds depended upon the situation and the bearing of the surrounding circumstances, and the nature of the custody which they were allowed to exercise over the bonds, the extent to which they were permitted to have access to the bonds under instructions by correspondence from the plaintiff, who lived in Iowa, either for the purpose of holding them as collaterals to notes, or for the purpose of detaching the coupons, had a direct bearing upon the question of their obligation to make examination when advised of the speculations of their assistant cashier.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

The bank is bound only to keep the deposit with the same care that it keeps its own property of like description. Boyden v. Bank of Cape Fear, 65 N. C. 13.

But another case has held that the standard of the conduct of the bank is not its care with reference to its own property, but the general conduct of the class to which it belongs. Merchants Nat. Bank v. Guilmartin, 93 Ga. 503.

But it has been held that the mere fact that the bank keeps its own property in the inner vault of the bank while it leaves the special deposit in the outer vault, will not render the bank liable for the loss by burglary. Leeds v. Trenton Bank, 1 Stewart's N. J. Dig. 78.

So, the fact that a tin box containing securities left for safe keeping is not placed in the safe at night where the bank places its own security, but is left in the vault outside, is not sufficient of itself to charge the bank in case they are lost while its own property in the safe is undisturbed. Griffith v. Zipperwick, 28 Ohio St. 388.

*1. Where a special deposit of property for gratuitous safe keeping was made with a bank, which, through its cashier, issued a receipt for the property, specifying that the same was held subject to the order of the depositor, the cashier being duly authorized to issue such receipt, in an action by the depositor against the bank for the value of the property so deposited a prima facie case for the plaintiff was made out by introducing the receipt in evidence, and proving a failure to deliver to the plaintiff on his demand the property therein described, and the burden was thus cast upon the defendant of showing it had exercised at least slight diligence in the care and keeping of the property.

*2. Where in such a case it appeared that the property so deposited was stolen by the cashier himself, the bank, even if it exercised due diligence in selecting him, was not discharged from liability, unless it affirmatively showed, further, that it had not been guilty of gross negligence in retaining the cashier in office after it knew, or ought in the exercise of slight diligence to have known, that he was or had become unworthy of trust; and it does not show this by merely proving that up to a given time, three or more years previous to the discovery of the theft, his reputation was good, and that "he stood in the community for honesty and integrity as high as any man." In view of the fact that he had actually stolen the property in question, it was incumbent upon the bank to show that during the whole term of the bailment it had exercised, at least, a slight supervision of him, and that, in so doing, no indications of dishonesty or other reason for distrusting him had appeared.

*3. The court was right in refusing by its charge to make the determination of the question whether or not the bank observed that degree of diligence which was due to the plaintiff dependent upon the question whether or not, under similar circumstances, it trusted its cashier with its own property of like kind. What the bank ought to have done in order to come up to the measure of diligence required by law cannot be arrived at by showing what it actually did in other matters relating to its own affairs.

*4. The case, upon its substantial merits, is controlled by the propositions above announced. The requests to charge were, so far as consistent with the law of the case, covered by the general charge. The verdict, under the evidence, was right; and in none of the grounds of the motion for a new trial does cause for a reversal of the judgment below appear.

ERROR to the City Court of Savannah to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold defendant liable for the loss of a special deposit made with it and embezzled by its cashier. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Erwin, Du Bignon, & Chisholm and Barrow & Osborne for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. R. Saussy and C. N. West for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case now before us is quite similar to that of Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Guilmartin, 88 Ga. 797, 17 L. R. A. 322, and 93 Ga. 503, in which this court dealt at length with the duties and liabilities incurred by a bank in accepting from one of its customers a special deposit, under circumstances which, in law, would create a gratuitous bailment. resentation that in case a special deposit is left with the bank it will be placed in the safest place so as to enhance the obligation of the bank in regard to the deposit so made. Hale v. Rawallie, 8 Kan. 137.

If the safe was so situated as to be accessible from the street, the door being at times open, while there were places inside the bank from which the door of the safe was not visible, the bank may be found guilty of gross negligence in leaving the deposit in the safe so exposed. Pattison v. Syracuse Nat. Bank, 80 N. Y. 82, 36 Am. Rep. 582.

Delivery to wrong person.

If the bank permits collaterals to be used by a third person without the knowledge of their owner, it may be liable to him for their loss. Hyre v. Central Bank, 48 Mo. App. 434.

If the property is turned over to the husband of the depositor without her consent the bank may be held liable. Ganley v. Troy City Nat. Bank, 98 N. Y. 487.

A bank will be liable for securities left with it on special deposit if, without authority from the owner, it permits her agent to use them as collateral security for loans to the firm of which the agent is a member. Manhattan Bank v. Walker, 130 U. S. 267, 32 L. ed. 959.

But if the contract of deposit provides that the box containing it is to be delivered to the bearer of a deposit ticket, the bank will violate no duty if it delivers it to the bearer of such ticket, especially if such bearer had authority from the person whose name is on the box, although the box was kept in that name for an ulterior purpose, and was in fact the property of the person who deposited it and from whom the card was taken without his knowledge or authority. Fisk v. Germania Nat. Bank, 40 La. Ann. 820.

Misappropriation by bank.

If the deposit is converted to the use of the bank the bank will be liable. Hughes v. First Nat. Bank, 17 W. N. C. 178.

If the bank itself converts the deposit, it will be liable for the amount. First Nat. Bank v. Strong, 28 Ill. App. 325.

Although the deposit was at first left with the cashier, and not with the bank, the bank will be liable for it in case it was pledged for a debt of the bank. Hughes v. First Nat. Bank, 110 Pa. 428.

If the deposit is converted to the use of the bank, of the elaborate discussion of the subject then entered into, it will not be necessary in this opinion to again cite the numerous authorities in support of the rule that it is incumbent upon a bank, in order to vindicate its diligence where the loss of a special deposit occurs through the negligence or dishonesty of one of its employees, to show reasonable care and circumspection on its part, both as regards the selection of such employee in the first instance, and as to his subsequent retention in a position of trust. Our present endeavor will therefore be simply to show the application of this rule to the facts of the case at bar.

1. The plaintiff having satisfactorily proved authority on the part of the defendant's cashier to receive and receipt for the special deposit in question, a prima facie case was made out by them introducing in evidence the receipt given by the cashier, and proving a failure to deliver the property on demand. Under § 2064 of the Code, the burden would thus be cast upon the defendant of showing it had exercised, at least, slight diligence in the care and keeping of the property.

2. The defendant sought to escape liability on the ground that the loss of plaintiff's property was sustained through no negligence on its part, but was due solely to the wrongful conduct of its defaulting cashier, who had embezzled not only the special deposit of the plaintiff, but also a considerable amount of valuable property belonging to the bank itself. In support of this defense, evidence was introduced to show that all requisite diligence had been observed in the selection of the cashier; that he had remained in the service of the bank many years, and had gained the implicit confidence of its managing officers; and that, up to about three years previous to the discovery of the theft, his reputation was not merely good, but "he stood in the community for honesty and integrity as high as any man." No definite account, however, was given of the cashier, either as to his reputation or conduct, during the three years next preceding the discovery of his defalcation. It does not appear that during this period any effort was made on the part of the officials of the bank to inquire into or even casually scrutinize the conduct or habits of the cashier, and determine for themselves his true character for honesty and integrity, or to exercise even a slight supervision over the important affairs with which he was intrusted. On the contrary, it would seem that they allowed themselves to be lulled into a state of tranquil inactivity by the sense of fancied security they derived from the assumption that, as he had in the past proved faithful to his trust, he must surely remain equally trustworthy in the future.

In the argument before us it was earnestly insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the officials of the bank had done all that could reasonably be expected of them in regard to informing themselves as to the real character of the cashier; for, as it was argued, it having been once definitely ascertained by them that his reputation for honesty and integrity was above suspicion, they had a right to rely upon the presumption of law that he would remain honest and reliable. While this contention is ingenious and was strongly stated, it cannot be accepted as sound. Presumptions of this kind are raised by law as mere rules of evidence, and have no application whatever to the conduct of men in the ordinary affairs of life; being designed merely to expedite and assist judicial investigation, and not being intended to influence or justify the acts or omissions to act, of those upon whom is devolved the performance of legal duties, nor to set up a standard by which their diligence shall be measured and tested. The application of these rules of evidence in the conduct of everyday business affairs would often lead to complete absurdities. For instance, how could it be said that a banker, implicitly relying upon the vague presumption of law that everyone is honest until the contrary is shown, would be justified in piling up money intrusted to his care in the middle of the street, and leaving it there to take care of itself. We cannot reach the conclusion that the showing of diligence made by the defendant in the present case reasonably met the requirements of the law. The rule as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Preston v. Prather, 137 U. S. 604, 34 L. ed. 788, and as universally recognized, is, that "persons depositing valuable articles with banks for safe keeping without reward have a right to expect that such measures will be taken as will ordinarily secure them from burglars outside and from thieves within; that even for the purpose of concealing embezzlements by its cashier, the bank must return it to the owner. First Nat. Bank v. Dunbar, 118 Ill. 625.

If the bank joins with the agent of the depositor in a breach of trust, it is liable. Walker v. Manhattan Bank, 25 Fed. Rep. 247. But that case held that the mere delivery of the securities to the agent, with knowledge that he is about to pledge them to a third person for his own profit, does not make the bank liable, but that doctrine was disproved by the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal.

Misappropriation by officer.

If bonds deposited for safe keeping without compensation are stolen by the teller of the bank, the bank is not liable except in case of gross negligence. Scott v. National Bank, 72 Pa. 471, 13 Am. Rep. 711, 10 Canada L. J. N. S. 182.

If the deposit is lost by larceny on the part of the cashier, whom the directors have no reason to suspect of dishonesty, the bank will not be liable. Comp v. Carlisle Deposit Bank, 94 Pa. 409.

For liability for loss by theft by officer of bank generally, see note to Taylor v. Downey (Mich.) 29 L. R. A. 92.

Retention of dishonest officer.

If a cashier is retained with knowledge that he is speculating in stocks, the bank may be held liable for special deposits misappropriated by him. Merchants Nat. Bank v. Guilmartin, 93 Ga. 503.

It is gross negligence to retain as assistant cashier a person who acknowledges that he has been speculating on the board of trade. Prather v. Kean, 29 Fed. Rep. 498.

Trover.

Trover will lie against the bank if it converts the deposit to its own use. Coffey v. National Bank, 46 Mo. 140, 2 Am. Rep. 488.

But trover will not lie against the bank for a special deposit lost through negligence. Dearbourn v. Union Nat. Bank, 58 Me. 273. H. P. F.

whenever ground for suspicion arises an examination will be made to see that they have not been abstracted or tampered with, that competent men, both as to ability and integrity, for the discharge of these duties will be employed; and that they will be removed whenever found wanting in either of these particulars." The requirement that not only must due diligence be observed in selecting a cashier in the first place, but that some degree of supervision over him, with a view to ascertaining whether he should be retained, ought to be exercised, is by no means a harsh one. Indeed, the rule of diligence applicable to banks is a material modification in their favor of that governing ordinary bailees. Usually, where a bailee is intrusted with valuable property, he cannot shift the responsibility of accounting for it by showing that a wrongful conversion of the property was committed by another person to whom he delegated the duty imposed upon himself alone; for, as a general rule, he would be held to have employed such other person at his own peril, and every act of his agent would, in law, be the act of himself. It is only that the law looks to the intention of the parties, where property is deposited with a bank for safekeeping, that the strict rule as to bailments is relaxed, and a bank is allowed to discharge itself from liability by showing that, although loss occurred through the dishonesty of its agents, it had itself exercised due care and circumspection, both as to their selection in the first place, and as to their retention in office thereafter. A corporation can act only through its agents; and it is evident that, when a person makes a special deposit with a bank, he understands that his property must, of necessity, be placed in the keeping of employees in the service of the corporation. Therefore he is held to tacitly agree that he will not attempt to hold the bank responsible for loss if it in good faith takes all reasonable precautions in having suitable and competent agents to discharge the trusts delegated to it. However, it is not true that in such case the depositor consents that the duty raised by the bailment may be shifted upon the shoulders of persons other than the bailee. This duty remains owing by the bailee alone. The depositor simply assents to the employment by the bailee of agents to aid it in the performance of such duty, the effect of which is merely to change the test of liability resting upon the bailee in case of loss.

The court below fully, but concisely, charged the jury as to the manner in which the defendant could vindicate its diligence in regard to the employment and retention of its cashier. The only possible objection to the charge we have been able to discover is that the judge instructed the jury, in effect, that it was incumbent on the bank to show that, during the whole term of the bailment, it had exercised, at least, a slight supervision over its cashier, and that, in so doing, no indications of dishonesty, or other reason for distrusting him, had appeared. After careful reflection, we feel safe in reaching the conclusion that this was not stating the rule too strongly against the defendant. The duty imposed by law upon a bank to remove from its service an employee who has become wanting either in ability or integrity necessarily comprehends the incidental requirement of maintaining a reasonable surveillance or supervision over such employee; else, how is the bank to know when such duty of removal arises? Certainly, where a bank is called upon to explain its nonobservance, it cannot be deemed a sufficient answer that the bank failed to comply with this duty simply because it was not aware that the time for its observance had arrived, when it was within the power of the bank, by the exercise of but slight diligence, to have fully informed itself that the necessity to act, and to act promptly, was at hand. The duty of a bailee to provide competent agents to care for the property of the bailor may be analogized to the similar obligation resting upon a master to provide suitable coemployees when a servant is expected to work in connection with others. This court recognized that a master's duty in this regard did not cease with simply providing, in the first place, competent fellow servants, when in McDonald v. Eagle & P. Mfg. Co. 68 Ga. 839, the rule was laid down that 'a principal is not liable for the negligence of a fellow servant in the same job, unless the principal himself was negligent in not using ordinary diligence in selecting the fellow servant, or in retaining him after knowledge of incompetency or negligence." Such is the rule which likewise obtains in many other jurisdictions. Thus, where an agent, competent and skilful at the date of his hiring, subsequently acquires the habit of intoxication, the master is guilty of negligence if he retains such agent with knowledge of that fact. Lanning v. New York C. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 521; Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579; Huntington & B. T. R. & C. Co. v. Decker, 84 Pa. 419; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Collarn, 73 Ind. 261, 38 Am Rep. 134. And mere lack of actual knowledge of the servant's unfitness will not necessarily excuse the master. He cannot shut his eyes, and claim exemption from liability, but must use the proper degree of diligence in keeping informed of the servant's habits and conduct. In Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. 10 Allen, 233, 87 Am. Dec. 635, it was held: "If the switchman was an habitual drunkard, and this fact was known or ought to have been known to the corporation, and the injury resulted from his intoxication, the corporation is responsible." The same rule was announced in Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 63 Ill. 293, Scott, J., saying, "Whether O'Keefe was a careful and competent man when he was first employed by the company, is not now a material inquiry. The controlling question is, whether he was an unfit person for his position at the time of the injury to Sullivan, and whether the company knew of his incapacity, or could have known it by the exercise of reasonable diligence." Certainly, it is all-important that a bank should keep a reasonable supervision over such of its employees as occupy positions offering the temptation and the means to do wrong, for, as already intimated, without the maintenance of some surveillance, the duty of removing such employees when they become deficient or unreliable could seldom be known or performed until too late to shield from loss the persons for whose protection the duty is imposed by law.

3. The fact that the defendant bank intrusted its own money and other property to the safe keeping of its defaulting cashier, and, in consequence, itself suffered a heavy loss through his speculations, is one which the jury might very properly consider in arriving at a conclusion concerning the good faith and diligence observed by the bank's officials. However, this solitary fact could not properly serve as the test upon which the liability of the bank should be made to depend. What the bank ought to have done in order to come up to the full measure of diligence required by the law could not be arrived at by showing simply what it actually did in other matters relating to its own affairs. Indeed, the officials of the bank might have been grossly negligent concerning the care bestowed upon its own property, and it could not excuse its negligence in regard to the duty owing to its customers by showing that it had been equally negligent in failing to properly look after its own affairs. The question is not a new one, but has been repeatedly passed upon by other courts of unquestionably high standing, as came to the notice of the writer when he made a thorough and laborious research of the authorities preparatory to writing an opinion in the Guilmartin Case, when it made its first appearance before this court. See 88 Ga. 797, 17 L. R. A. 322. We confidently assume that our ruling upon this question will be readily accepted as correct without further citation of authority.

4. In none of the numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial filed by the plaintiff in error have we discovered error which would require or justify a reversal of the judgment of the court below denying another hearing. We cannot attempt the laborious task of dealing specifically with each of the alleged errors complained of, and have confined this discussion to such questions only as control the case upon its substantial merits. As will have been seen by the foregoing brief but exhaustive statement of the evidence relied upon by the defense to rebut the prima facie case of liability made out by the plaintiff, the defendant bank utterly failed in its attempt to prove due compliance with the requirements of the law as to diligence. Indeed, under the evidence submitted upon this issue, which was the main defense relied on by the bank, the jury would not have been warranted in finding other than they did. As to all other issues involved in the case, the verdict of the jury is amply sustained by the record before us, and could not properly be set aside.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed. Cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

CHISM, CHURCHILL, & COMPANY
v.
FIRST NATIONAL BANK of New York et al., Appts.

(.....Tenn.....)

A drawee bank which pays a draft relying on a forged indorsement thereon of the name of a fictitious person to whom the payee indorsed it innocently as the result of a fraud practiced upon him is not thereby relieved from liability to the payee.

(May 23, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount of a draft drawn by plaintiffs which had been paid to a wrong payee. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Turley & Wright, for appellants:

The English rule is that if the party issuing the paper knew at the time that the person to whom it was made payable or to whom it was indorsed was a fictitious person, then he is estopped from setting up that fact and the paper is payable to the bearer and a bona fide holder can recover on the same. But if the party issuing the paper was innocent in the matter and did not know that the person to whom it was made payable or to whom it was indorsed was fictitious, there seems a conflict as to whether indorsee can acquire title to the paper as against the true owner thereof.

Some of the American states have followed this doctrine, but the weight of American authorities seems to be that the question of knowledge on the part of the person issuing the paper cuts no figure; that whether he knew or did not know that the party to whom it was made payable was fictitious he is equally estopped from denying that fact, and the paper is to be treated as payable to bearer without regard to the knowledge or innocence of the party issuing it.

By purchasing the draft on the First National Bank of New York through its correspondent here, complainants had the amount of the draft appropriated to their use or order in the New York bank. A contract relation was thus created between the First National Bank of New York and complainants whereby the bank should pay upon order of complainants. This it refuses to do and now complainants sue for the amount remaining in its possession to their credit.

By especially indorsing the draft to H. C. Hamilton, the complainants attempted to draw a check upon the New York bank, payable to the order of this special indorsee. By this check the effort was to appropriate to H. C. Hamilton of their funds in the hands of the New York bank the amount that the draft called for. But there was no payee to whom the check could be paid. Although the complainants did not know that they had been deceived by Weems there was no such person as H. C. Hamilton, so the draft or the check was ineffective because there was no payee and it was impossible to have any money of complainants in the hands of the First National Bank appropriated to anybody.

The amount of money originally held by the New York bank has never been paid out according to the order of complainants, therefore it still remains to their credit and should be returned to them on their demand or order.

The bank did not pay upon order of H. C. Hamilton; it paid upon the order of E. M. Weems, or rather on forged order of Hamilton by Weems; therefore it is liable to complainants, for it could only pay according to order.

The maker's intention is the controlling consideration which determines the character of such paper. It cannot be treated as payable to bearer unless the maker knows the payee to be fictitious and actually intends to make the paper payable to a fictitious person.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants are cotton factors in the city of Memphis. On the 13th day of July, 1894, they purchased from the First National Bank of Memphis a draft for $3,000, payable to their order, and drawn on the defendant, the First National Bank of New York. After getting this draft, they indorsed it, "Pay to H. C. Hamilton or order," and then placed it in the hands of one Weems, to be delivered to the indorsee, Hamilton. The drawing, indorsement, and delivery of this draft were the result of a fraudulent scheme which Weems practiced upon complainants. They were induced by him (at that time a man of fine reputation in the community) to think Hamilton was a real person, who had consigned to him as warehouseman, for storage and sale, a large lot of cotton, and this draft represented the advance which complainants agreed to make to the supposed consignor upon this cotton, upon an understanding that they were to sell same and earn the commissions accuring therefrom. It turned out, however, that Hamilton was nonexistent, and that Weems had no such cotton under his charge. But the record discloses that complainants neither knew nor had occasion to suspect such to be the facts, but, believing that Hamilton was a real personage, and with the view of carrying out this agreement with Weems, they purchased this draft, and turned it over to him, indorsed as is stated above, for delivery to their indorsee. Immediately after its receipt, Weems indorsed it to himself or order, using for this purpose the name of Hamilton, and then carried it to the Mercantile Bank of Memphis, and that bank, without any suspicion of the bad faith of the transaction, or of the right of Weems to transfer title, upon his indorsement, paid him full value for it, and then forwarded it to its correspondent in New York, by whom in due time it was presented to the drawee, who, equally ignorant of the want of title in Weems, and in perfect good faith, paid it. Discovering within a few days the fraud practiced upon them, and at the same time that the draft had already been paid, this bill was filed by complainants, the payee, against the drawee, the First National Bank of New York, and the Mercantile Bank of Memphis; against the first upon an assumpsit implied from the wrongful appropriation of the draft and a refusal to account for its proceeds, and against the latter as a garnishee holding funds of the former subject to attachment. Two defenses are made: First, that complainants were guilty of such carelessness in their dealings with Weems as to estop them from setting up the present claim; second, that the indorsement by Chism, Churchill, & Co. of this draft to a fictitious indorsee was in law an indorsement to bearer, and the result was that its payment through the usual channels of trade, without notice of the alleged defect, discharged the drawee.

As to the first of these grounds, it is sufficient to say that the record fails to show any recklessness or carelessness upon the part of complainants in this transaction to prevent a recovery, if for any sound reason this suit is maintainable. It is the second ground, however, upon which the defendants rest largely their defense to this claim. What is the effect of indorsing a bill to a fictitious person, the indorser not knowing that the indorsee was fictitious, but, on the other hand, believing him to be a real person, is a question of first impression in this state. There is no doubt it is true, as a general proposition, that the holder of commercial papers, payable to order, must trace his title through a genuine indorsement, including that of the payee. 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 988; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 731; 1 Edwards, Bills & Notes, § 519; Mead v. Young, 4 T. R. 28–30. And it is equally true that where a banker pays a draft or check drawn upon him, he, at his peril, pays it to anyone but the payee, or to one who is able to trace his title back to the payee through genuine indorsements. The mere possession of the check or bill under apparent title does not necessarily imply the right to demand or receive payment, and when it is paid to such holder the drawer has put upon him the risk of seeing that the apparent is the real title to the paper; for the banker holds the funds of his depositor under an obligation to pay them to him or to his order, and if he pays them otherwise he cannot treat such a payment as a discharge of his liability. Shipman v. Bank of the State, 126 N. Y. 318, 12 L. R. A. 791; Robarts v. Tucker, 16 Q. B. 575; Dodge v. National Exch. Bank, 30 Ohio St. 1. It is otherwise as to his payment of a check or bill payable to bearer. In such a case, in the absence of knowledge that the party presenting the paper is wrongfully in possession of it, he can safely pay, because in so doing he is complying with the positive demand of his depositor. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 312. And it is insisted for the defense that this was the legal effect of the indorsement by Chism, Churchill, & Co. to Hamilton, the fictitious indorser. It seems from a note to Byles, Bills, p. 58, that the controversy over the effect of indorsement of bills to fictitious persons grew out of the bankruptcy of Linsay & Co. and Gibson & Co., who negotiated bills with fictitious names upon them to the amount of nearly a million sterling a year. A great many cases grew out of these indorsements in the various courts of England, one of which (Minet v. Gibson, 3 T. R. 481) was carried to the House of Lords [Gibson v. Minet], 1 H. Bl. 569. Mr. Chitty, in his work on Bills (p. 178), says: "The result of the discussion seems to be that a bill payable to a fictitious person or his order is, in effect, a bill payable to bearer, and may be declared on as such in favor of a bona fide holder ignorant of the fact against all the parties knowing that the payee was a fictitious person." In other words, whether such a bill was collectible by the holder, as if payable to bearer, depended upon the fact that the party against whom it was sought to be enforced, at the time he assumed liability upon it, knew that the payee was fictitious. Where he possessed such knowledge he was estopped from saying to a bona fide holder that he was not bound; otherwise he would be a party to the circulation of commercial paper, apparently good, yet with an inherent vice which rendered it worthless, at least as to him, though it fell into the hands of an innocent purchaser. Subsequently the bill of exchange act of 1882 was passed, the effect of which was in fact that a bill might be treated as payable to bearer when the party named as payee was a real person, but has not and was not intended by the drawer to have any right arising out of it. Bank of England v. Vagliano [1891] A. C. 107. In this country, among the text-writers, Mr. Daniel states the rule as general, and says that, "in the case of a note payable to a fictitious person it appears to be well settled that any bona fide holder may recover on it against the maker as upon a note payable to bearer. It will be no defense against such bona fide holder for the maker to set up that he did not know the payee to be fictitious." Mr. Daniel rests the rule upon the ground of estoppel, but Mr. Randolph, in his work on Commercial Paper (vol. 1, § 164, note 4), suggests that the cases cited by him to support his text "apply this rule only where the maker has by his words or conduct raised any estoppel against himself," and this latter author fails in his text, as we understand it, to give the sanction of his approval to the rule as announced by Mr. Daniel.

The questions presented in this case have arisen and been discussed in but few of the American courts, and the conclusions reached by them have been variant. Blodgett v. Jackson, 40 N. H. 21, relied upon by the defendants in this case, we think is not authority for the rule contended for by them. There a note payable to a firm of Whitney, Shaw, Lent, & Howes was in the possession of Lent, and was sold and transferred by him for value to the plaintiff in the action. The defendant, the maker of the note, denied the genuineness of the indorsement. To the issue made by this denial the court said: "The bare possession of this note by this person was competent evidence to be submitted to the jury, that he (the party transferring) was the Lent named in the note, and of course a member of the firm, and authorized to indorse it in the manner he did." "Here was a note which the evidence tends to show was genuine, payable to Whitney, Shaw, Lent, & Howes; a thing of value, and likely to be in the possession of the owner. Such possession, therefore, raised a presumption of ownership." Kohn v. Watkins, 26 Kan. 691, 40 Am. Rep. 336, does raise the precise question here presented, and is a direct authority for the contention of defendants. In that case it was held that the drawer of a bill, who makes it payable to a fictitious person, and transmits it to a third person for delivery to the payee, is bound to a bona fide purchaser from that third party who indorses it with the name of the payee, though the drawer, when he issued the bill, believed that the payee was a real person, and intended it to be delivered to him only upon the receipt of a valuable consideration from him. The court rested its opinion on the text of Mr. Daniel, which has already been adverted to, and certain cases which were regarded as authorities, to sustain the rule adopted. Lane v. Krekle, 22 Iowa, 399, one of these cases, while it contains a dictum which is in harmony with the conclusions reached by the court citing it, was confessedly not an authority on the real point in controversy, as in that case the note sued on was payable to bearer. Another of these cases is Phillips v. Im Thurn, 18 C. B. N. S. 694. There the signature of the drawer, as well as the indorsement, was a forgery, but the acceptor was held liable upon the ground that he had misled the holder. The ground of the decision, as stated by Keating, J., in the final disposition of this case reported in L. R. 1 C. P. 463–472, was that, "upon the facts stated in this special case, it was not competent for the defendant to deny the genuineness of this bill. He knew that the plaintiffs were willing to advance money upon the bill only upon his vouching by his acceptance of it the authenticity of the drawing." Forbes v. Espy, 21 Ohio St. 474, was also relied upon in Kohn v. Watkins, supra. In that case E. & Co. issued a bill on New York to the order of C. H. & Co., its purchasers, who indorsed it to one Charles Clark, whose real name, however, was Maro. This was not a case of a fictitious payee, but of a man with an alias, or an assumed name, taking title in this assumed, rather than his real, name. So the court held that the indorsement and delivery of this bill to Clark must be regarded as an affirmation to all persons not otherwise informed that there was such a person as Charles Clark, and that Maro was that person. We do not think, upon these facts, that this case can be said to support the general rule to which it was cited, and this was evidently the view of the supreme court of Ohio in a case to be referred to at length hereafter. Upon the other hand, we have at least two well-considered cases which, in effect, adopt the English rule, to wit, that only such paper as is issued to a fictitious payee or indorsee by the party sought to be bound, with full knowledge of the fact, shall be treated as payable to bearer. In one of these cases,—that of Armstrong v. National Bank, 46 Ohio St. 512, 6 L. R. A. 625,—after a careful review of the authorities, it is said: "If the drawer of a check, acting in good faith, makes it payable to a certain person or order, supposing there is such person, when in fact there is none, no good reason can be perceived why the banker should be excused if he pay the check to a fraudulent holder upon any less precautions than if it had been made payable to a real person; in other words, why he should not be required to use the same precautions in the one case as in the other, that is, determine whether the indorsement is a genuine one or not. The fact that the payee is a nonexisting person does not increase the liability of the bank to be deceived by the indorsement." The case of Shipman v. Bank of the State, 126 N. Y. 318, 12 L. R. A. 791, involved over $200,000, was argued by counsel of research and ability, and was determind by a court of deserved reputation. In that case it appeared that the plaintiffs were depositors in the defendant bank. They drew checks for large sums to fictitious payees, supposing them to be real persons. These checks were given to a trusted employee, to be turned over to the respective payees. Instead, however, this employee indorsed the names of the payees upon them, and had them presented to the drawee, when they were paid without inquiry or suspicion of the genuineness of the indorsements. Suits having been instituted by the drawer to recover the sums so paid out, it was resisted upon the ground that these checks were in law payable to bearer. The court, however, speaking through O'Brien, J., says: "The maker's intention is the controlling consideration which determines the character of such paper. It cannot be treated as payable to bearer unless the maker knows the payee to be fictitious and actually intends to make the paper payable to a fictitious person." We think the rule thus limited is reasonable, while to eliminate the element of knowledge or intent would leave it harsh and unreasonable. In addition, with this limitation, the law of negotiable paper, so far as it involves the question of forgery, is consistent; for it is universally conceded that the payment of a check or a bill drawn to the order of a real person upon a forged indorsement of the payee's name will not protect. In such a case the banker is still liable to the owner for the funds in hand as though no payment had been made. 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1739. And this would be so even if the forger should personate an intended payee of the same name. Com. v. Foster, 114 Mass. 311, 19 Am. Rep. 353. Then, in a case where the drawer has been guilty of no wrong, but innocently issues or indorses his check or bill to a fictitious person, believing him to be real, and a third party without authority writes the name of this fictitious payee or indorsee upon it, and by this fraud succeeds in collecting it, why should the drawee, by payment of such indorsement, discharge himself from liability to the drawer? The writing of the name of the nonexisting payee under such conditions is forgery at common law (4 Bl. Com. p. 247; 2 Whart. Crim. L. § 653) and under Mill. & V. Code, § 5492. In the present case, without fault on the part of the complainants, the drawee has paid upon a forged indorsement, to a party not entitled to collect it, a bill of which Chism, Churchill, & Co. were owners, and which no one had a right to collect save upon their order, and now has it, and declines to account for its value. Under these circumstances, we think the chancellor was right in holding the drawee liable, and we therefore affirm his decree.

C. R. WHITE.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The duty of disclosing to a tenant hidden defects and secret conditions that contribute to make the property unsafe is not imposed upon a landlord who is ignorant of them without fault or negligence on his part.
2. Fire escapes need not be provided by a landlord for the safety of a tenant or for anyone on the premises by the latter's invitation or permission, unless this is required by statute or ordinance.
3. An ordinance requiring fire escapes on buildings of specified kinds, when it is a subsection of a general ordinance covering the whole subject of erection of buildings within the city, repeals by necessary implication an earlier ordinance which made a different list of the buildings to be provided with fire escapes and placed the control of the matter in the hands of a different officer.
4. Failure of the owner of a building to comply with the ordinance as to fire escapes, even if not of itself the ground of an action by a person injured thereby, is at least a matter to be considered in connection with other facts and circumstances on the question of negligence.

(June 13, 1896.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shelby County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in consequence of the absence of fire escapes while attempting to escape from defendant's burning building. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Turley & Wright, for plaintiffs in error:

The landlord does not warrant premises to be fit or convenient for the purposes for which they are released, or that they are in good condition or safe. If there is a hidden defect which may be dangerous, and of which he knows, then he is liable for injuries resulting therefrom to the tenant, but upon the ground of fault and deceit. But where the tenant knows or has had equal opportunity of knowing the situation with the landlord, no matter how dangerous the premises may be there can be no recovery in the event the tenant is injured.

NOTE.—For liability on account of the want of fire escapes on a building, see note to Rose v. King (Ohio) 15 L. R. A. 160.

For such liability as to tenant of part of premises, see also note to Jones v. Millsaps (Miss.) 23 L. R. A. 157.

No action lies by a tenant against a landlord on account of the condition of the premises hired, in the absence of an express warranty or of active deceit.

Where there is a common-law and statutory duty imposed upon one party with reference to another, and there is an alleged breach of duty on the part of the person, the violation of the city ordinance bearing upon the question may be read as evidence tending to show such breach, but no case can be found where no such duty exists either at common law or by statute where the obligation may be created in the first instance by the ordinance.

Messrs. Morgan & McFarland also for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. James M. Greer and C. D. M. Greer for defendant in error.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error were the owners of a four-story building in Memphis, which was burned in November, 1893. At that time the Young Men's Christian Association occupied the second and third floors, under a contract of subtenancy. The defendant in error was a member of the association, and, when the fire occurred, was on the second floor. In attempting to escape, he leaped to the ground, and was seriously injured. This suit was instituted by him against the owners of the property to recover damages for this injury. The gravamen of his declaration is that the building was negligently constructed, in that, contrary to law and the ordinances of the city, it was not provided with fire escapes, and that this neglect was the proximate cause of his injury. Upon issues properly made, there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff below. The case is before us upon assignments of error to the charge of the trial judge. Two of these will be noticed:

1. In his instructions to the jury, he said: "Under the common law, when a landlord leased or rented a house to a tenant he was bound to deal fairly with such tenant. He was required to disclose to the tenant any hidden defects in the construction of the building, or any secret conditions or surroundings that contributed to render the building unsafe to life, limb, health, or property, so that if the landlord fails to make such disclosures as would apprise the tenant of the condition of the premises before he became his tenant, and the failure to make such disclosures caused the tenant, or some one there on his invitation, to be injured or suffer loss, then such act of the landlord was held to be fraudulent, and made him liable for whatever injury resulted." It will be seen that in this paragraph the circuit judge in effect, tells the jury that the common law placed on the landlord the duty of disclosure to the tenant of hidden defects and secret conditions that contribue to make the demised property unsafe and made him liable for any injuries resulting therefrom, not only to his tenant, but to anyone on the premises by the invitation of his tenant, though the landlord was ignorant of these defects and conditions, without fault and negligence on his part. The common law imposes no such responsibility on the landlord. It does not make him an insurer to the tenant. On the contrary, in the ordinary contract of letting, it does not imply any warranty on the part of the landlord that the leased premises are in a safe and habitable condition, since the tenant ordinarily has it in his power to inspect the premises and so accepts them at his own risk. Buswell, Pers. Inj. § 82. In Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 245, 50 Am. Rep. 659, it is said: "It is a universal rule, to which no exception can be found in any case now regarded as authority, that upon the demise of real estate there is no implied warranty that the property is fit for occupation, or suitable for the use or purpose for which it is hired." In Jaffe v. Harteau, 56 N. Y. 398, 15 Am. Rep. 438, it was held that "a lessor of buildings, in the absence of fraud, or any agreement to that effect, is not liable to the lessee or others lawfully upon the premises for their condition, or that they are tenantable, and may be safely and conveniently used for the purposes for which they are apparently intended." In Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 501, Kelly, C. B., said that there was no implied warranty by the lessor that the demised real estate "shall be reasonably fit, or fit at all, for the purpose for which it is let." And in Keates v. Earl Cadogan, 10 C. B. 591, the rule is stated to be that no action will lie by a tenant against the landlord on account of the condition of the premises leased, in the absence of an express warranty, or active deceit. In Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380, 44 Am. Rep. 471, the court said: "In the case at bar, there was no express or implied warranty, and no actual fraud or misrepresentation. If the action can be maintained, it must be on the ground that it was the duty of the defendants to inform the tenant of the defect in the staircase; this duty, if it exists, does not arise from the contract between the parties, but from the relation between them, and is imposed by law. If such a duty is imposed by law, it would seem that there is no distinction, as a ground of liability, between an intentional and an unintentional neglect to perform it; but in such a case as this is, there can be no such duty without knowledge of the defect." The same doctrine is announced in Viterbo v. Friedlander, 120 U. S. 712, 30 L. ed. 777, and it is elaborated with great research and ability in Doyle v. Union P. R. Co. 147 U. S. 413, 37 L. ed. 223, it is also recognized by this court in Banks v. White, 1 Sneed, 614, and Southern Oil Works v. Bickford, 14 Lea, 657. In laying down, as the rule of the common law, one so widely different from that announced in the foregoing cases, the trial judge was guilty of manifest error, the effect of which was not cured in the subsequent part of his charge. What is here said in discussing this subject is not intended to conflict with the case of Hines v. Wilcox, 33 S. W. 914, 96 Tenn. ——. In that case it was announced that the landlord was liable, not only for what he knew of the defects in the premises let, but for what he might have known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, while in this, under the instructions of the trial judge, the rule, as announced by him, would make the landlord liable for hidden defects from which injuries were received, without regard to the question of diligence and reasonable care.

2. But the plaintiff below not only rested his right of recovery upon what he claimed was common-law negligence of the owners of the property destroyed, but also upon their violation of certain ordinances, as to fire escapes of the city of Memphis, which were given in evidence. Independent of statute or ordinance, we do not think that the duty is imposed upon the owner of leased property to provide such appliances for the safety of the tenant, or for anyone on the premises by the latter's invitation or permission. It is held that there is no common-law obligation resting on the master to provide means of escape from fire for his employees. Jones v. Granite Mills, 126 Mass. 84, 30 Am. Rep. 661; Keith v. Granite Mills, Id. 90, 30 Am. Rep. 666; Pauley v. Steam Gauge & Lantern Co. 131 N. Y. 90, 15 L. R. A. 194. And we do not grant that it can be insisted that the common law would place a higher duty upon the landlord, in this regard. There were two ordinances of the city given in evidence to the jury, which the plaintiff contended had been violated. The first of these was passed in 1880, and is as follows: "Sec. 166*a*. The proprietor, lessee, occupant, or person in charge of each and every hotel, theatre, public hall, or public building in the taxing district, or any building where manufactories, dress making, millinery, or any other kind of work whatsoever, in the third story, or any story above the third story of said building, is done, is hereby required to provide safe and sufficient fire escapes from each and every story of the same; to be constructed under the supervision and to the entire satisfaction of the district engineer and the chief of the fire department, and each day's failure to provide the same, or any part thereof, or to keep the same, or any part thereof, in good repair, shall be deemed a distinct and separate offense." In 1890, the municipal authorities of Memphis passed an ordinance entitled "Building Ordinance of the Taxing District of Shelby County" (city of Memphis), consisting of many sections and subsections, in which the whole subject of the erection of private and public buildings within the city limits is provided for and regulated. Subsection 27*i* of this general ordinance is as follows: "Subsec. 27*i*. All buildings now erected, or that may hereafter be erected, three or more stories in height, occupied or built to be occupied by three or more families above the first floor, and every building already erected or that may hereafter be built three or more stories in height, occupied or used as a hotel, lodging house, or boarding house, having more than fifteen rooms, and every factory, mill, office building, manufactory, or workshop, hospital, asylum, or institution for the care or treatment of individuals, and every building in whole or in part occupied or used as a school or place of instruction or assembly, shall be provided with such good and sufficient fire escapes, or other means of egress in case of fire, or shall be directed by the inspector of buildings, and said inspector shall direct such means of egress to be provided in all cases where he shall deem the same necessary." The trial judge gave both in charge to the jury as existing ordinances bearing on the issues in this case. In this he again committed an error, as it is clear that the later ordinance (that is, that of 1890), by necessary implication, repealed the earlier. The ordinance of 1880 was simply directed to the subject of fire escapes, and provided for their construction "under the supervision and to the entire satisfaction of the district engineer and the chief of the fire department," while that of 1890 places the exclusive control of this matter in the hands of the inspector of buildings. To this extent they are inconsistent. In addition, as before stated, the latter is a subjection of a general ordinance covering the whole subject of the erection of buildings within the city, and regulates it down to minute details. It is well settled that a subsequent statute "revising the whole subject-matter of a former one will operate as a repeal of it, though it contains no express words of repeal (1 Beach, Mun. Corp. § 521, and cases cited in note 3), especially if it contains provisions inconsistent with the earlier statute (Poe v. State, 85 Tenn. 495). And this is so even if material parts of the former statute are omitted. Terrell v. State, 86 Tenn. 523. See also State, West, v. Butcher, 93 Tenn. 679. And there is no reason why this rule should not apply to city ordinances. 1 Beach, Mun. Corp. § 521; Providence v. Union R. Co. 12 R. I. 473; Booth v. Carthage, 67 Ill. 102. But it is insisted that the ordinance of 1890 imposed no duty upon the owners of this building for a breach of which a civil action can be maintained by anyone sustaining an injury from such breach, and that, therefore, the trial judge was in error in letting it go to the jury. It is conceded that for a violation of a general statute a civil action will lie, at the instance of a party injured thereby. Queen v. Dayton Coal & I. Co. 95 Tenn. 458, 30 L. R. A. 82. But it is insisted that this is not true with regard to a violation of a municipal ordinance. An examination of the authorities will show much diversity of judicial opinion on this question. The cases of Bott v. Pratt, 33 Minn. 323, 53 Am. Rep. 47; Osborne v. McMasters, 40 Minn. 103; Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. ed. 410, and Salisbury v. Herchenroder, 106 Mass. 458, 8 Am. Rep. 354,—held that for the violation of a municipal ordinance an action can be maintained by a private individual injured thereby. The cases of Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Ervin, 89 Pa. 71; Flynn v. Canton Co. 40 Md. 312, 17 Am. Rep. 603; Heeney v. Sprague, 11 R. I. 456, 23 Am. Rep. 502; and Vandyke v. Cincinnati, 1 Disney (Ohio) 532,—took the contrary view. We do not think we are called upon to settle this question in this case, however. The trial judge simply told the jury that, if they found that plaintiffs in error had failed to comply with the ordinances of the city as to fire escapes, they might look at that fact, "in connection with the other facts and circumstances" shown, on the question of negligence. We do not think that plaintiffs in error can complain of this instruction.

For the errors pointed out the case must be reversed and remanded.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

M. V. B. CHASE et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
YORK COUNTY SAVINGS BANK.

(.....Tex.....)

The interest of persons who contribute money to purchase lands conveyed to a trustee who has the absolute title and is a trustee for the purpose only of accounting for the proceeds of sales is not subject to levy under a writ of attachment.

(March 9, 1896.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District reversing a judgment in favor of transferees of the interest of cestuis que trust in certain trust property as against attacking creditors of the assignors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. C. Foster and A. E. Wilkinson for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs I. N. Standifer and Dillard & Muse for defendant in error

Denman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The agreed case in the record shows that W. P. Rice, having furnished $14,000, H. C Young, $6,000, O. D. Baker, $6,000, M. H. French, $6,000, C. N Seidlitz, $3,000, J. M. Ford, $6,000, P. E. Fairbanks, $6,000, J. J. Frey, $2,000, G. B. Weightman, $1,000, J. J. Fairbanks, $3,000, and P. P. Lang, $1,000 of the consideration for the purchase of nine tracts of land, situated near Denison, Texas, caused the same to be conveyed to said P. E. Fairbanks, trustee, by deeds from various parties; that said land was so conveyed to the said P. E. Fairbanks, trustee, for the purpose and with the intention of vesting in him, the said trustee, the absolute title thereto, and in order that the same might be by him disposed of and conveyed without the necessity of the others joining in said conveyances, and without intending in the use of the word "trustee" in the deed made to him any limitations of the titles to said lands in the said P. E. Fairbanks, or his absolute right to sell the same, or any part thereof, he to be trustee, as between himself and parties furnishing the money, "for the purpose only of accounting for the proceeds arising from any sale or sales of said lands, or any part thereof;" that, in consideration of $1, paid by said Fairbanks to each of the parties furnishing said consideration, they "did severally remise, release, and convey unto him, the said P. E. Fairbanks, and to his successors and assigns forever, all and singular their right, title, and interest in and to said lands, and every part thereof, to have and to hold the premises above described, together with, all and singular, the rights and appurtenances thereto in any way belonging unto the said Fairbanks, his successors and assigns;" that it was agreed that, as between the parties furnishing the consideration and said Fairbanks, trustee, he "should not be released from his personal obligation to account to each of them, and to their assigns, for the proceeds of any sale or sales of said lands, or any part thereof, according to their respective interests in such proceeds;" that thereafter, with the consent of all said parties, said trustee caused a large portion of said lands to be laid off and platted into lots, blocks, streets, avenues, and alleys, such plats and maps being duly recorded, said lands not being within the corporate limits of the city of Denison, but adjoining and designated and platted, as above stated, as an addition thereto, the streets and alleys of said city being extended and duly opened and dedicated through said addition to the public use; that said trustee, after said subdivision was made, conveyed to different parties portions of said lands, the deeds thereto being recorded, but the quantity of lands and the number of purchasers and prices paid are not stated. The York County Savings Bank caused an attachment to be levied on said lands as the property of French and Rice, who had transferred their respective interests in said trust to other parties, of which transfers the bank had no notice at the time of the levy. In a proceeding to wind up said trust, and divide the proceeds and unsold property among the parties entitled, the bank claimed the interest of French and Rice under said attachment proceedings, and their said transferees claimed the same by virtue of said transfers It is unnecessary to state the circumstances showing how the question arose in the court below, but it will suffice to say that the principal and only question we deem it necessary to determine is whether the respective interests of French and Rice in said trust were subject to levy under a writ of attachment. The trial court decided the question in the negative, and rendered judgment in favor of said transferees, but the court of civil appeals decided in the affirmative, and reversed the judgment of the trial court, and rendered judgment for the bank. The transferees assign as error here this ruling of the court of civil appeals.

Article 200, Rev. Stat. 1895, provides that "the writ of attachment may be levied on such property, and none other, as is or may be by law subject to levy under the writ of execution." In order, therefore, to determine whether the interest of French and Rice in the trust was subject to levy under the attachment, we must ascertain whether it was subject to execution. That equitable interests were not subject to execution at common law is elementary. In order to enable creditors to subject to the payment of their debts such interests of their debtors in lands as were held by others in trust for them, the statute of 29 Car. II., chap. 3, provided "that . . . it shall and may be lawful for every sheriff or other officer to whom any writ or precept is or shall be directed, . . upon any judgment," etc., "to do, make, and deliver execution unto the party in that behalf suing, of all such lands, tenements," etc., "as any other person or persons . . . shall be seised or possessed in trust for him against whom execution is so sued," etc. In Doe, Hull, v. Greenhill, 4 Barn. & Ald. 684, Abbott, Ch. J., in construing this statute, said: "This statute made a change in the common law, and, up to a certain extent at least, made a trust the subject of inquiry and cognizance in a legal proceeding. We think the trust that is to be thus treated, must be a clear and simple trust, for the benefit of the debtor; the object of the statute appearing to us to be, merely to remove the technical objection arising from the interest in land being legally vested in another person, where it is so vested for the benefit of the debtor." In construing the same statute, enacted in New York, Spencer, Ch. J. (Bogert v. Perry, 17 Johns. 351, 8 Am. Dec. 411), said: "It cannot admit of a doubt that the statute embraces those cases only where the entire estate out of which the use arises, vests in the cestui que use, in consequence of his having paid the whole consideration money; and I have met with no case or dictum countenancing the doctrine of a divided use, vested in the vendor and vendee;" and held that the interest of the vendee in a contract for the sale of land, who had paid only a part of the purchase money, was not subject to execution.

In Lynch v. Utica Ins. Co. 18 Wend. 236, Lynch devised his estate to executors in trust: (1) To pay debts; (2) to raise $60,000, and invest same in securities, and out of the income thereof to pay his wife an annuity of $300,000, and reinvest the surplus; (3) to raise $10,000, to be divided between two persons named; (4) to divide the residue, real and personal, equally between his son, James Lynch, and seven others. In passing upon the same statute, Nelson, Ch. J., said: "I do not entertain a doubt that the estate of Lynch under the will, is an interest that could not have been sold on execution within the statute. It is settled according to several authorities, and one of them in this court, that the statute only extends to clear and simple trusts for the benefit of the debtor. Bogert v. Perry, 17 Johns. 351, 8 Am. Dec. 411, 1 Johns. Ch. 52; Doe, Hull, v. Greenhill, 4 Barn. & Ald. 684, 4 Bing. 96. In Bogert v. Perry, Spencer, Ch. J., said that it was intended to subject to execution the real estate or hereditaments of a person having the entire interest therein, but which was nominally and formally vested in another person. The case in Bingham is not unlike the present one. There the lands were vested in trustees in trust for the judgment debtor, subject to £10,000 to be raised for another, and which had not yet been raised. The court held that the interest of the cestui que trust was not liable within the statute, as it was not simply the debtor's, but held jointly with another,"—the person entitled to the portion of £10,000.

In Bristow v. McCall (1881) 16 S. C. 545, the testator devised his real estate to executors in trust for his son and daughter, stating: "I hereby direct my executors, hereinafter named, to divide my lands equally between my son, E., and daughter, D., and permit each to use, possess, and enjoy his or her half in severalty during his or her natural life, and, after the death of either, that they divide the share of each among his or her children equally." The executors divided the land as directed, between E. and D., and each went into possession of the share thus allotted. Thereafter E.'s interest was levied upon and sold under execution. The court held that the purchaser took no title by such sale, under a statute similar to the one above quoted, saying: "The trust interest referred to, it is true, is not very distinctly defined in the act, nor is it clearly pointed out in the decisions. But it is conceded that it must be a clear and simple trust and for the benefit of the debtor alone, the object of the statute being merely to remove the technical objection arising from the interest in the land being legally vested in another person, where it is so vested for the benefit of the debtor. Doe, Hull, v. Greenhill, supra; White v. Kavanagh, 8 Rich. L. 395. A simple trust is said by the authorities to be (Lewin, Tr. 21; Bouvier, Inst. § 1900) 'a trust corresponding with the ancient use; and it exists where property is simply vested in one person for the use of another and the nature of the trust not being qualified by the letter is left to the construction of the law.' A trust of this kind, for the benefit of the debtor alone, and not jointly with others, would fall under this section, but if others were interested, that fact would exclude the application of the statute."

In Love v. Smathers (1880) 82 N. C. 369, A, having paid part purchase money for lands, gave his note for the balance, with B and C as sureties, and had the title made to B, who agreed to pay the balance purchase money. It was held that A's interest was not, under a statute similar to the ones above, a pure trust, subject to execution, but was mixed with the interest of B; the court saying: "A trust estate of a debtor in land could not be levied on and sold under execution until the act of 1812, nor under that act, if it was to be raised by construction of a court of equity by reason of fraud, or being an express or implied trust in an honest transaction, unless the debtor, at the time of the sale, was in such situation as to have the legal title deereed to him if he were to sue for it." See Freem. Executions, 2d ed. §§ 187, 188; McIlvaine v. Smith, 97 Am. Dec., and notes 303 to 315.

We have no statute in Texas similar to the ones discussed in the above cases expressly authorizing the sale of trust estates under execution. Our statute in reference to executions, however, does provide that "when a sale has been made, and the terms thereof complied with, the officer shall execute and deliver to the purchaser a conveyance of all the right, title, interest, and claim which the defendant in execution had in and to the property sold." Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 2375. In construing this statute in 1854, in the case of Daugherty v. Cox, 13 Tex. 209, this court, through Lipscomb, Justice, says: "They insist that under the broad terms used, of 'interest' and 'claim,' an equitable interest would be included. This may be correct in part; it may be that an equitable claim to title, or a resulting trust, may sometimes be subject to sale by execution, and yet every equity not subject to sale. If, for instance, a purchaser had paid for the land and taken a bond for title, the land would be subject to execution against the purchaser, because there would be nothing uncertain, nothing to be done on the part of the purchaser, nor on the part of the vendor, but to make the title. If, however, other things were to be done by the parties,—as in this case, a selection was to be made out of a particular but large tract,—until these things were done, there would be no such equity to any particular land as would make it subject to the levy of an execution against the holder of such equity. . . . (Bogert v Perry, supra). It could not be contended that our statute in the article cited went further than the statute 29 Car. II., in subjecting equitable and trust estates to execution; and perhaps its terms would go so far, but that would not be far enough to subject such an equity as the one claimed to be subjected to execution in this case."

In Hendricks v. Snediker, 30 Tex. 307, this court questioned the validity of an execution sale of the equitable interest of a person in lands, growing out of a right to specific performance of a voluntary agreement to convey, followed by valuable improvements made relying upon such agreement; saying, through Moore, Ch. J.: "Would the equitable rights of the party making improvements under such circumstances be subject to levy and sale under execution? The rights of such a party are more or less indefinite and uncertain until they have been fixed by the decree of the court. They seem much more in the nature of an uncertain and undetermined claim or demand against the holder of the title to the land, by enforcing which he may acquire an interest in the land, than a title or interest directly in it. If uncertain interests of the sort are the subject of sale under execution, evidently they must be made at ruinous sacrifices to debtors, and without effecting the purpose of the law in satisfying the claims of creditors. The position of such party is not like that of one holding under a contract with specific and definite conditions and stipulations. The right to a decree in each case of this kind must depend on its own peculiar circumstances. An equitable interest in lands may, no doubt, be the subject of execution sale, but this is not the case in respect to every equitable interest." On the authority of this case, a similar sale was held void in Edwards v. Norton, 55 Tex. 410.

In Moser v. Tucker, 87 Tex. 94, this court, through Stayton, Ch. J., says: "It is not, however, every interest in property a debtor may have right to, or to acquire, that may be subjected to sale under execution, or otherwise, for payment of his debts; for in many instances his right is so remote and contingent that it is deemed more likely to subserve the ends of justice not so to subject it, than to take the risk of sacrifice of contingent right by procedure which will most likely be of no practical benefit to the creditor or may be ruinous to the debtor."

Thus we see that this court, being called upon at an early day to determine whether our statute authorized the levy of an execution upon all the equitable interests in land, held in Daugherty v. Cox, supra, that it did not, and that it went no further than the English statute. This is in accord with the construction placed upon a similar provision elsewhere. Goodwin v. Anderson, 5 Smedes & M. 730. While this court has never undertaken to lay down any general rule by which it might be determined whether a given equity could, under the statute, be subjected to execution, it is believed that its decisions of the particular cases which have come before it are in harmony with the current of authority elsewhere, unless it be different in allowing the interest of a purchaser under a contract for sale of land, where only a part of the purchase money has been paid, to be thus subjected. Mooring v. McBride, 62 Tex. 309; Bogert v Perry, 17 Johns. 351, 8 Am. Dec. 411; Hopkins v. Carey, 23 Miss. 59; Hinsdale v. Thornton, 74 N. C. 167. The principle upon which the decisions limiting the operation of the statute to "a clear and simple trust for the benefit of the debtor" rest is fully recognized by our decisions, and is thus well stated by Chief Justice Moore in the case above cited: "If uncertain interests of this sort are the subject of sale under execution, evidently they must be made at ruinous sacrifices to debtors, and without effecting the purpose of the law in satisfying the claims of creditors."

According to the agreed case before us, the parties furnishing the money to purchase the land, in the exercise of their legal rights to make such contracts and disposition of their property as they deemed proper, there being no claim of an intent to injure creditors in the creation of the trust, caused to be vested in the trustee, Fairbanks, the "absolute title" to the property, with full power of sale, and provided that the word "trustee," used in the deed, with reference to him, should not have the ordinary effect of limiting his title or right to sell, but that he was to be trustee "for the purpose only of accounting for the proceeds arising from any sale or sales of said lands, or any part thereof," and that he "should not be released from his personal obligations to account to each of them, and to their assigns, for the proceeds of any sale or sales of said lands, or any part thereof, according to their respective interests in such proceeds." It is clear that if it was the intention of all parties to so place the entire title, legal and equitable, to the land in the trustee that it would be absolutely beyond the control of either of the cestuis que trustent, such cestuis que trustent to have only the right to demand an accounting of the trustee. The legal effect of the arrangement was to leave in each cestui que trust, not any title, legal or equitable, in the land, but a mere right in equity to demand an accounting of the proceeds of the sales of the land. Doubtless a court of equity would, in certain contingencies not contemplated by, or provided for in, the agreement of the parties,—such as fraud on the part of the trustees, or a total failure of the objects contemplated by the trust, such as inability to sell the land for sufficient to defray probable expenses, or any other state of facts justifying the dissolution of the trust,—treat this mere equitable right of demanding an accounting under the agreement as entitling each cestui que trust to a participation in the division of the trust property itself upon such dissolution; but, in the absence of such a contingency, equity could not recognize the cestui que trust as having any interest in the land, as such, without doing violence to the lawful agreement by which the cestuis que trust and the trustee, respectively, restricted and regulated the rights of each party interested in the trust, and without which it probably would not have been created. We have found no case holding such an interest subject to execution, and to so hold would be going beyond the authorities. It is not claimed that any such contingency had arisen at the time of the levy. We are therefore of the opinion that the equitable interests of French and Rice in the trust were not subject to the levy, and that they could have been reached only by an equitable proceeding for that purpose. Hinsdale v. Thornton, 75 N. C. 382; McIlvaine v. Smith, 42 Mo. 45, 97 Am. Dec. 295, and note. We are not called upon to determine whether the levy would have been valid if such a contingency as would have justified a court of equity in dissolving the trust had arisen before the time of the levy. We have only considered the case presented. We regard article 2291, Rev. Stat. 1879, as restricting the right of levy on such trusts as would be otherwise liable, and not as granting any additional rights to levy.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals will be reversed, and the judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

FORSYTH & INGRAM
v.
MANN BROTHERS.

(68 Vt. 116.)

1. A contract to manufacture a monument is not within the statute of frauds, although there is no agreement to bestow personal skill and labor upon it, or anything to prevent the contractor from purchasing it elsewhere in whole or in part, instead of manufacturing it from his own quarry and in his own shop.
2. The difficulty and extra expense of procuring the stock for a monument in winter months and the limited time available, where a contractor who had agreed to furnish it in the spring repudiated the agreement late in December, may constitute elements of damages for breach of contract, when the other party was also bound to furnish it to a third party.
3. Change of stock in the top die of a monument which is procured elsewhere after breach of a contract to furnish it does not affect the right to recover damages for such breach, if the substituted stock costs no more than that called for by the contract.

(March 14, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Washington County Court made during the trial of an action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract which resulted in a judgment in plaintiff's favor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Gordon and George W. Wing, for defendants:

The contract was clearly within the statute of frauds. If the contract is intended to result in transferring for a price from B to A a chattel in which A had no previous property it is a contract for the sale of a chattel and is within the statute.

The Massachusetts rule is simply a method of determining the intention of the parties and has never been recognized in our state. If the contract is essentially a contract for the article manufactured or to be manufactured, the statute applies to it, but if it is for the manufacture, for the work, labor, and skill to be bestowed in producing the article, the statute does not apply.

If the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from such a contract (a contract with the third party) which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of the contract under the special circumstances so known and communicated.

Messrs. William A. Lord and Dillingham, Huse, & Howland, for plaintiffs:

The contract was one that was valid in the condition of affairs proved by the testimony and found by the court.

Ellison v. Brigham, 38 Vt. 64.

Rowell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs carried on a wholesale granite business, and the defendants quarried and manufactured granite. The plaintiffs, having agreed to furnish a monument for the state of Minnesota, to be erected at Gettysburg, contracted with the defendants therefor at and for the price of $4,100. The court says that it did not find that the defendants were to bestow their personal skill and labor upon the monument, nor that there was anything in the understanding or agreement that would have prevented them from purchasing it elsewhere, in whole or in parts, instead of manufacturing it from their quarry, and at their shop. The defendant's original offer in the premises was in writing, but was so modified by verbal changes before acceptance that the contract must be regarded as resting wholly in parol; and the principal question is whether it is within the statute of frauds.

The cases on the subject are conflicting and irreconcilable, but capable of a somewhat accurate classification. Clay v. Yates, 1 Hurlst. & N. 73, was for printing a book and finding materials, and was discussed as if the question was quite new and without authority. The contract was held not to be within the statute of frauds. The true criterion was said to be whether work is the essence of the contract, or whether it is the materials supplied. Pollock, C. B., said that his impression was that, in the case of a work of art, whether in gold, silver, marble, or plaster, where the application of skill and labor is of the highest description, and the material is of no importance compared with the labor, the price could be recovered as work, labor, and materials; that, no doubt, in such cases, it is a chattel that is bargained for, and, if delivered, could be recovered for as goods sold and delivered, but still it could also be recovered for as work, labor, and materials. It is said, in Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best & S. 272, that this case is sui generis, and the test there adopted is rejected, though the court said they should be bound to follow it in a case precisely similar in its circumstances. Lee v. Griffin is an extreme case. It was brought by a dentist to recover twenty-one pounds for artificial teeth made for a lady who died before she took them, and of whose will the defendant was executor, and was held to be within the statute of frauds as being a contract for the sale of goods. Crompton, J., says: "The teeth are the principal subject-matter, and the case is near that of a tailor, who measures for a garment and afterwards supplies the article fitted." And he lays down this test: "When the contract is such that a chattel is ultimately to be delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, when it has been sent, the cause of action is goods sold and delivered." Hill, J., states the test thus: "When the subject-matter of the contract is a chattel to be afterwards delivered, then the cause of action is goods sold and delivered, and the seller cannot sue for work and labor." Blackburn, J., thus: "If the contract be such that when carried out it would result in the sale of a chattel" the proper form of action, if the employer refuses to accept the article when made, would be for not accepting. But if the work and labor be bestowed in such a manner that the result would not be anything that could properly be said to be the subject of sale, then an action for work and labor is the proper remedy. He said he did not think that the relative value of the labor and the materials on which it was bestowed can in any case be the test of what is the cause of action; that, if a sculptor contracts to execute a work of art for another, much as the value of the skill might exceed that of the materials, the contract would, nevertheless, be for the sale of a chattel. This case is said to have settled the law in England, and from it Mr. Benjamin deduces this rule: "If the contract is intended to result in transferring for a price from A to B, a chattel in which A had no previous property, it is a contract for the sale of a chattel, and unless that be the case, there can be no sale." 1 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's ed. § 102, p. 121. Mr. Browne says that all the cases under this head of the statute have been cases of contracts that, when carried out, resulted in the sale of a chattel; that the very question has always been whether, notwithstanding that fact, the particular contract should be regarded as for, not the resulting chattel, but the labor or the technical or artistic skill of which the purchaser was to receive the benefit; and that the case of Lee v. Griffin seems to reject rather than to illustrate this difficult distinction, which a long course of authority has introduced into the law of the construction of the statute. Browne, Stat. Fr. 5th ed. § 309*a*. In New York they go to the other extreme, and hold that an agreement for the sale of a thing not in existence at the time, but which the contractor is to manufacture, or to put into condition to be delivered, is not a contract of sale, and so not within the statute. The difference between their rule and the English rule is this: One looks to the time at which the contract was made; the other to the time at which it is to be performed, and if, then, it is a chattel, it is a sale. Cooke v. Millard, 65 N. Y. 352, 22 Am. Rep. 619. Some of the states follow the New York rule more or less closely, while others do not, and also reject the English rule as settled in Lee v. Griffin. In Massachusetts they have avoided both of these extremes, and hold that a contract for the sale of articles in existence, or for such as the vendor, in the ordinary course of his business, manufactures or procures for the general market, whether on hand at the time or not, is a contract for the sale of goods, to which the statute applies; but that, on the other hand, if the goods are to be manufactured especially for the purchaser, and upon his special order, and not for the general market, the case is not within the statute. It is said to be true that, in "the infinitely various shades of different contracts," there is some practical difficulty in disposing of the questions that arise, yet that there is no ground for saying that there is any uncertainty in the rule itself, and that its correctness and justice are clearly implied or expressly affirmed in all their decisions upon the subject. Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450, 15 Am. Rep. 112, which was this: The plaintiff agreed to build a buggy for the defendant and to deliver it at such a time. The defendant gave directions as to the style and finish, and it was built accordingly, and marked with his monogram. It was destroyed by fire before delivery, and the plaintiff sued for the price. Lee v. Griffin was pressed upon the attention of the court, and it was asked to overrule Mixer v. Howarth, 21 Pick. 205, 32 Am. Dec. 256. But the court said that the case before it was a much stronger case than Mixer v. Howarth, for the carriage was not only built for the defendant, but in conformity in some respects with his directions, and at his request was marked with his initials, and that it was neither intended nor adapted for the general market, and that, as they were by no means prepared to overrule that case, they must hold that the statute did not apply to the contract.

Under this rule the test is, not the nonexistence of the article at the time of the bargain, as in New York, nor whether the contract will result in the sale of a chattel, as in England, but whether the goods are such as the vendor, in the ordinary course of his business, manufactures or procures for the general market, or whether they are manufactured especially for the vendee, and on his special order, and not for the general market, and for which they are neither intended nor adapted. The equity of this rule is expressly recognized by the supreme court of New Hampshire in Pitkin v. Noyes, 48 N. H. 294, 2 Am. Rep 218, 97 Am. Dec. 615. In Cason v. Cheely, 6 Ga. 554, it is said that, ex æquo et bono, a man who agrees to bestow his labor in the manufacture of goods for a price, and which price he must lose unless the goods are received by him who ordered them, ought to be paid, and that a statute that would protect the purchaser from liability in such a case would be alike impolitic and unjust. It is no answer to say that the vendor may protect himself, in such a case, by a memorandum of the contract, for the question is whether the contract comes within the statute. This court said, in Ellison v. Brigham, 38 Vt. 64, that the fact that work and labor are to be performed upon the subject of the contract before delivery does not necessarily take the contract out of the statute; that to take it out, the contract must require the performance thereon of such work and labor as will materially change the character of the property, and make it, when to be delivered, essentially different from what it was when the contract was made,—in short, that the contract must be one for manufacture, or, in other words, for work and labor. Whether the rule as there stated needs modification to make it entirely accurate need not be considered, for it is certainly accurate in embracing, as it does, contracts for the manufacture of goods on special orders, without which they would not be manufactured at all, and for a special purpose, for which alone they are adapted, and for which alone they have value, which is the case with the monument in question. This comes clearly within the Massachusetts rule, which we regard preferable, in this particular, at all events, as avoiding the extremes we have noticed, and as best according with the law as understood and administered in this state. But it is said that as the defendants were not bound to bestow their personal skill and labor upon the monument, but were at liberty to get others to make it for them,—it is a contract of sale, and not for work and labor. But that makes no difference, as was said in Bird v. Muhlinbrink, 1 Rich. L. 199, 44 Am. Dec. 247. It is not necessary that personal skill and labor should be stipulated for in order to make a contract one for manufacture. It is sufficient if the work and labor requisite to such a contract are to be performed by the contractor, or by his procurement, and at his expense. The latter would be work and labor done by him, in the eye of the law, and could be declared for as such. We hold, therefore, that the contract in question is not within the statute.

This leaves no other question that merits consideration except that of damages, and whether the change of stock that plaintiffs made in the top die of the monument defeats recovery. In the first place, the monument was to be completed by the defendants during the fall of 1892; but, owing to a strike of granite cutters in May of that year, the time was extended to the spring of 1893. On December 8, 1892, the defendants, claiming that they had failed to get a contract with the plaintiffs for the monument, notified them that they had concluded to stop cutting, and should take no order for dressed work after that date. The plaintiffs replied, on December 22, claiming a contract, and insisting upon its performance; and, after waiting a reasonable time for a reply, but receiving none, proceeded to purchase stock and have the monument cut. Owing to the difficulty and extra expense of procuring the stock in the winter months, and the limited time after December 22 that plaintiffs had in which to finish the monument in season for delivery in the spring of 1893,—the time fixed by their contract with the state of Minnesota,—they necessarily expended, in and about the business, the sum of $5,034.95, and could not have procured the monument for a less sum. Of said sum, $200 were for plaintiffs' personal services in getting stock, having it cut, and superintending the work. If the stock had been procured in warm weather, and the work prosecuted in the usual and ordinary way of doing such work to the best advantage, the monument could have been built and placed on the cars within five months from the time it was commenced, and at an expense not exceeding $4,100. As built, the monument was substantially the same as the defendants were to build, except that the top die was dark stock instead of good, clean, medium stock; but the plaintiffs paid no more for it than the market value of good, clean, medium stock. The court allowed, as damages, the cost of the monument in excess of the contract price, namely, $934.95, with interest thereon. The defendants object that this excess is not recoverable, because, they say, it was occasioned by the limitation of time for the completion of the monument under the plaintiffs' contract with the state of Minnesota, of which time they had no knowledge, and therefore cannot be said to have contracted with reference to it, and hence that such excess is not chargeable to them. It is not quite certain whether the defendants had the spring, or only to the spring, to finish the monument. But if they had the spring, the plaintiffs also had the spring in which to fulfil their contract with Minnesota; and if they had the monument ready for delivery on the 1st of April, which the case does not really show, it does not appear that it cost any more than it would had the plaintiffs taken the whole spring far the work, which was the longest time defendants had. Hence it does not appear that said excess was occasioned as claimed, but rather that it resulted from the defendants' breach of contract; for, as to them, the plaintiffs had a right to complete the monument by the time they were to complete it, and if plaintiffs did it sooner, but at no greater cost than if they had taken the whole time, the defendants cannot complain that they did not know what time the plaintiffs had, for they are not harmed by it. Defendants further object that nothing should have been allowed for the plaintiffs' personal services. But under the findings this was a necessary expense, and therefore recoverable, the same as though they had paid others for performing the service. The change of stock in the top die, above mentioned, does not defeat recovery, as claimed, because, if for no other reason, the stock substituted cost no more than that called for by the contract would have cost.

Judgment affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

E. H. BALL et al., Exrs., etc., of D. F. Connell, Deceased, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(.....Va.....)

Amending a declaration under leave granted on sustaining a demurrer thereto prevents any objection to that ruling upon appeal.

2. The murder of a passenger when asleep in a sleeping car by some intruder, stranger, or fellow passenger, does not render the carrier liable, if the carrier or its employees did not know of any impending danger and there were no circumstances to arouse their suspicions.

(April 9, 1896.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the City of Richmond to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, who was killed while a passenger on defendant's train by a gun-shot wound inflicted by a third person, which defendants were alleged to have negligently permitted. Affirmed.

Statement by Keith, P.:

The executors of D. F. Connell, in an action of trespass on the case brought in the circuit court of the city of Richmond, complain of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company and the Pullman Palace Car Company, defendants, and set out the following cause of action: That on the 1st of August, 1891, their testator was a passenger upon a sleeping car owned by the Pullman Palace-Car Company, which was attached to and made a part of the train running upon the tracks of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, and that it became the duty of the defendants to use due and proper care that he should be safely and securely carried on said railway, as aforesaid, and protected from violence and injury while on the train; that the defendants did not use due and proper care in that behalf, but by their negligence, carelessness, and default, at or near Waynesboro, or between Waynesboro and Basic City, on the line of said railway, some person to the plaintiffs unknown, armed with a deadly weapon, was allowed by the defendants to enter the car or coach owned or controlled and run by the defendants, in which plaintiffs' testator was then riding, with the intent to rob or murder him, and who did, without default on his part, shoot him in the abdomen with a ball fired then and there from a gun or pistol, without any attempt being made by the defendants, or their servants or agents, to protect him, inflicting thereby a deadly wound, hurt, and injury; and that, as the result and direct consequence of the wound and injury thus inflicted, their testator died on the 4th of August, 1891. The second count alleges that, being a passenger on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway their testator, out of extra precaution and for the purpose of obtaining greater security and protection, took passage on the sleeping car or lodging coach owned or leased by the defendants, and lost his life, substantially as described in the first count. The third count avers that he was shot while asleep in his bed or berth. The fourth count charges negligence upon the part of the defendants in failing to perform their duty reasonably to guard and protect the plaintiff's testator, while a passenger, against violence from any person on said coach or car. And the fifth count avers that, while occupying a berth in the sleeping car, the defendants and their servants carelessly and negligently conducted and behaved themselves in not keeping proper care and watch, so as to reasonably protect plaintiff's testator from violence from any person on or in said sleeping car; and that, by and through their negligence, carelessness, and default, some person unknown to the plaintiffs, armed with a deadly weapon, was allowed to go to the berth in which their testator was sleeping, with the intent to rob or murder him, and inflicted the wound before described. To this declaration, and to each one of its five counts, which, while varying somewhat as to the mode of stating the plaintiffs' case, present substantially the same question of law, the defendants filed their demurrer. The circuit court sustained the demurrer, and permitted the plaintiffs to amend their declaration; and an amended declaration was accordingly filed. To this declaration, and to each count thereof, the defendants also demurred, and the court sustained this demurrer; and thereupon the plaintiffs applied to one of the judges of this court for a writ of error, which was allowed.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first ground of error assigned here is to the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the original declaration. This position cannot be maintained; this court having held that, where a demurrer is sustained with leave to amend, if the plaintiffs exercise that privilege, they cannot afterwards be heard to object to the judgment upon the original declaration. See Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Gratt., at page 487; Darracott v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 83 Va. 288.

The demurrer to the amended declaration presents a question of novelty and interest, which, it is believed, has seldom arisen, and which certainly has never been passed upon by this court. Railways engaged as carriers of passengers, while not insurers against all injuries except by the act of God or of public enemies, as are the carriers of goods, are yet bound to carry safely those whom they take into their coaches, in so far as human care and foresight can provide,—that is to say, are bound to use the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons; and they will be held liable for the slightest negligence which human care, skill, and foresight could have foreseen and guarded against. See Farish v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. 697, 62 Am. Dec. 666. A passenger who sustains an injury growing out of the negligence of the carrier's servants or agents, or because of any defect in machinery, coaches, roadway, or other appliance connected with its transportation of passengers, is presumed, until the contrary is shown, to have been injured through the negligence of the carrier; and, upon proof of the injury, he has a prima facie case, which, in the absence of proof to the contrary, entitles him to recover damages for the wrong. The injury here, however, is not the result of any defect in the instrumentalities used by the defendants. The negligence averred is in the failure to observe such care and to take such precautions as would effectually protect a passenger asleep, in the nighttime, upon a Pullman coach, constituting a part of the train of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, from an assault made upon him by some unknown person, a passenger or intruder, as the declaration alleges, who was permitted to enter the Pullman car with intent to commit murder or robbery, and who did inflict upon the plaintiffs' testator injuries from which he died. It is not averred that the defendants or their employees knew that any danger impended over the testator of the plaintiffs in error, or that there was any circumstance to arouse their suspicion, however watchful and alert they may have been.

Counsel for the plaintiffs in error have brought to the attention of the court a number of adjudged cases which, upon investigation, turn out to be suits brought to recover damages for the loss of property upon sleeping cars by robbery or larceny. These cases establish a very high degree of duty from sleeping-car companies to their patrons, and language is used which would go far to sustain the contention of the plaintiffs in error were the facts under investigation in those cases at all similar to those under consideration here. In the case of Carpenter v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 53, 11 L. R. A. 759, the court says that "a traveler who pays for a berth is invited and has the right to sleep, and both parties to the contract know that he is to become powerless to defend his property from thieves, or his person from insult, and the company is bound to use a degree of care commensurate with the danger to which passengers are exposed." And, again, in the same case, it is said: They are "bound to have an employee charged with the duty of carefully and continually watching the interior of the car while berths are occupied by sleepers." In that case a passenger was robbed while asleep, and the court held that the company had been negligent in failing to keep a continual watch upon the interior of the car, and was liable. There is a strong array of cases of a like character; but, as all of them deal with the liability of carriers for the property of passengers which had been lost or stolen, an extended discussion of them would be unprofitable.

On the part of the defendants it is claimed, among other grounds of defense, that no responsibility for a wrong attaches wherever there intervenes the independent act of a third person between defendant's negligence and the injury sustained, which affects and is the immediate cause of the injury. This proposition is, without doubt, sustained by a convincing weight of authority; but we do not think it applies to this case, because the very negligence alleged consists in permitting the intrusion into the car of the third person whose independent act was the immediate cause of the injury. It will be necessary, therefore, to inquire what, upon principle, should be deemed the measure of the duty which the defendants owed to the injured person in this case, and what degree of negligence in the performance of that duty will render them responsible for the injury sustained.

Under no circumstances is a carrier of passengers for hire held as an insurer of their safety, though the highest degree of care and diligence in guarding their safety is required, and the slightest imputation of negligence against which human care and skill can provide will make them responsible for any defect in machinery, or for any negligence upon the part of their servants; but the negligence complained of must stand as the proximate cause of the injury sustained,—that is, it must be the direct and efficient cause of the injury. As was said by Justice Miller in Scheffer v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. ed. 1070: "To warrant a finding that negligence or an act not amounting to wanton wrong is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances." In this quotation is to be found the principle upon which this case should be decided,—a principle which goes far to reconcile the seeming conflict between the authorities cited on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendants in error. The cases relied by the plaintiffs in error are actions to recover the value of goods which passengers have lost while occupying berths upon sleeping cars. Robbery is of frequent occurrence, and larceny yet more frequent; and to invite a passenger to enter a sleeping car with his property, and to go to sleep, in the confidence that his person and property will be shielded and protected by those who have undertaken that duty, imposes a very high degree of watchfulness and care upon the sleeping-car company. Passengers are invited to enter and to sleep. They are thereby disarmed and incapacitated for self-protection. Carriers are paid to preserve watch and ward over their sleeping guests, and they are rightfully held to a due and faithful discharge of the obligations thus assumed. Experience teaches us that, when property is exposed to theft, it is apt to be stolen; but murder is of infrequent occurrence. When, therefore, a sleeping car company receives a passenger, and he retires to rest, it may well be assumed to anticipate and be required to guard and protect him against a crime which is likely to occur whenever the temptation and the opportunity are presented. It cannot be deemed to have anticipated or be expected to guard and protect him against a crime so horrid, and happily so rare, as that of murder. There is no causal connection between the negligence pleaded and the injury sustained. In a peaceful community, in a law-abiding and Christian land, a car of the defendant company is invaded in the night-time by an assassin, and an innocent man falls a victim to his murderous assault. Can it be said that, in leaving a door ajar, in permitting a stranger or passenger to enter, the defendants were guilty of negligence, when to hold them negligent would be to say that they should have expected the tragedy which gave rise to this action? To do so would be to require of them more than human foresight as to the minds and motives of men, and make them, indeed, insurers of the safety of passengers, while under their care, against all dangers, however remotely connected with their acts of omission or commission. This view does not seem to have prevailed in those cases in which injuries to the person, and not to the property, of passengers, have been the subject of investigation.

In the case of Putnam v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 108, 14 Am. Rep. 190, the subject is very fully considered and the court says that "the conductor was only called upon to act upon improprieties or offenses witnessed by him, or made known to him in some other way, and the company can only be charged for neglect of some duty arising from circumstances of which the conductor was cognizant, or of which he ought, in the discharge of his duties as conductor, to have been cognizant. . . . The law ordinarily looks only to the proximate cause of an injury in holding the wrongdoer liable to an action; and if the damage is not the probable consequence of a wrongful act, it is not the proximate cause, so as to make the wrongdoer liable." In McGrew v. Stone, 53 Pa. 436, the rule is declared to be "that a man is answerable for the consequences of a fault, which are natural and probable . . . while it is true that if his fault happen to concur with something extraordinary, and therefore not likely to be foreseen, he will not be answerable." In the case of Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 53 Pa. 512 (one of the leading cases upon this subject), it is said: "There is no such privity between the company and the disorderly passenger as to make them liable on the principle of respondeat superior. The only ground on which they can be charged is a violation of the contract they made with the injured party. They undertook to carry the plaintiff safely, and so negligently performed this contract that she was injured. This is the ground of her action—it can rest upon no other." In that case a riotous crowd rushed upon the cars in such numbers as to defy the power of the conductor to resist them. They commenced to fight in the car in which the plaintiff was injured. Three causes of error were assigned: First, "the evidence shows that the conductor did not do his duty by allowing improper persons to get on the cars; secondly, he allowed more persons than were proper, under the circumstances, to get on the train, and remain upon it; third, he did not do what he could and ought to have done to put a stop to the fight upon the train, which resulted in the plaintiff's injury." In discussing these errors, the court said that it had been left to the jury to "determine whether the disorderly character of the men who came upon the train had fallen under the conductor's observation, so as to induce a reasonable man to apprehend danger to the safety of the passengers." The plain meaning of this is that the liability depended upon the fact that the disorderly character of the men who were permitted to enter the train had come under the conductor's observation, and was such as to induce a reasonable man to apprehend danger to the safety of the passengers. The liability was made to rest upon the express or implied notice to the conductor of the dangerous character of those entering the train. In the case of New Orleans, St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Burke, 53 Miss. 200, 24 Am. Rep. 689, four or five persons were co-passengers with the plaintiff on a special train. They were riding together in a baggage car, and rudely deprived the plaintiff of his hat. The plaintiff sent to the conductor and informed him of the injury. The conductor asked them to return the hat. They became insulting, and a fight ensued, in which the plaintiff was shot. He sued, and recovered damages; the court holding that it is the duty of the conductor of a passenger train to preserve order, to protect passengers from insult and injury from their fellow passengers, and, if necessary to the discharge of this duty, he should stop the train and summon to his aid his fellow employees and such passengers as might be willing to assist, and eject the disorderly persons from the train. Failure to discharge this duty as far as he has the means and power renders the railroad company liable in damages to the injured or insulted passenger. In the course of its opinion the court says: "The liability of the carrier arises, not from the fact that the passenger has been injured, but from the failure of the officials to afford protection. It will be necessary, therefore, in each case to bring home to the conductor (or other agent or officer of the company) knowledge or opportunity to know that the injury was threatened, and to show that by his prompt intervention he could have prevented or mitigated it." In the case of Britton v. Atlanta & C. Air Lin R. Co. 88 N. C. 536, 43 Am. Rep. 749, it is held that it is the duty of the company to protect every passenger from the violence and assault of his fellow passengers or of intruders, and that it will be held responsible for its own or its servants' negligence in the premises when the same might have been foreseen and prevented by the exercise of proper care. "The liability of the defendant to the plaintiff grows not out of the fact that she was injured, but out of the failure of its servants to afford her protection, after they had reasonable grounds for believing that violence to her was imminent."

In the case of Batton v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 77 Ala. 591, 54 Am. Rep. 80, it was held that while it was the duty of a railroad company, as a common carrier, to protect its passengers against violence or disorderly conduct on the part of its own agents or other passengers and strangers when such violence or misconduct may be reasonably expected and prevented, yet that it is not liable to an action for damages for a wrong when it is not shown that the company had notice of any facts which justified the expectation that a wrong would be committed. And the court, in its opinion, says that all the cases upon the subject impose the qualification, that the wrong or injury done the passenger by such strangers must have been of such a character, and perpetrated under such circumstances, as that it might reasonably have been anticipated, or naturally expected to occur." These cases seem to stand upon a safe middle ground between the English classes which declare that a passenger is only entitled to protection at the hands of the carrier and its servants against such injuries as might reasonably be considered as within the contemplation of the parties at the time the ticket was purchased, which is the evidence of the contract of carriage (See Pounder v. North Eastern R. Co. [1892] 1 Q. B., at page 390), and the cases relied upon by the plaintiffs in error, in which the liability of sleeping-car companies as to the property of passengers is enforced, and in which there are expressions which seem to support the contention as to liability for injuries to their persons. As we have seen, the responsibility of the carrier does not flow directly from the injuries sustained, but rests upon the principle that it is the duty of railroad and sleeping car companies to convey their passengers and guests in comfort and safety; and, while not directly responsible to a passenger for a wrong inflicted by an intruder or stranger or fellow passenger, they are responsible for such injury if it appear that the companies knew, or ought to have known, that danger existed or was reasonably to be apprehended, and that they could, by the use of the agencies at their disposal, have prevented the mischief. It is better that the carrier should be held responsible to a passenger for injuries received at the hands of an intruder, a stranger, or a fellow passenger only in those cases where its agents or employees knew, or, in the light of surrounding circumstances ought to have known, that danger threatened or was to be apprehended, and then failed to use their authority and power to protect him from the impending peril, than that the hitherto recognized limits of responsibility for negligent acts should be enlarged, and the carrier be held to answer for a casualty wholly unforeseen, and of which this declaration contains the only recorded instance.

In this case, notice to the company or its agents is not charged, and no circumstance is alleged which could have put the company or its agents upon inquiry, or have excited the apprehension of the most careful and cautious. The wrong itself was not only unusual, but it is believed to be wholly without precedent. Certainly, the diligence of counsel and the labors of the court have failed to discover any similar case. Under such circumstances we think it would be harsh and oppressive to impose a liability upon the defendants.

The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer, and its judgment is affirmed.

B. L. SHARPSTEIN, Exr., etc., of Orley Hull, Deceased, Appt.

(.....Wash.....)

A parol agreement to convey real estate by will, made in settlement of a lawsuit, is not valid under the statute of frauds, although the intended devisee in consequence thereof gives up valuable rights.

(April 17, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Walla Walla County in favor of plaintiff in an action to compel specific performance of an agreement to convey property by will. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John L. Sharpstein and Wellington Clark, for appellant:

A parol contract to make a will whereby real estate shall be devised cannot be enforced.

Browne, Stat. Fr. § 266; Gould v. Mansfield, 103 Mass. 408, 4 Am. Rep. 573; Ellis v. Cary, 74 Wis. 176, 4 L. R. A. 55; Hale v. Hale, 90 Va. 728; Pond v. Sheean, 132 Ill. 312, 8 L. R. The fact that it includes personal as well as real estate does not take it out of the statute even as to such personal property.

Even though divisible, being for personal property over the value of $50, as well as real estate, it cannot be enforced.

The measure of damages on breach of contract to make a will is the value of that with which the party has parted, whether in money or services.

Rhodes v. Rhodes, 3 Sandf. Ch. 279.

Specific performance will not be granted when the legal remedy is sufficient.

Pom. Spec. Perf. Cont. § 47.

The complaint does not allege that the decedent devised or otherwise disposed of all his estate by will, or that he placed the same by will or otherwise beyond the reach of respondent; and it appears from the complaint that as an heir at law of decedent she can secure all the rights to which she is by law entitled without the aid of a court of equity.

Purcell v. Coleman, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 513, 18 L. ed. 435.

The proof must show that the consideration has been paid or tendered, or that there has been such part performance of the contract that its rescission would be a fraud on the other party, which could not be compensated by the recovery of damages.

Browne, Stat. Fr. §§ 452–454; Williams v. Morris, 95 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 360.

It is not enough that the act of part performance is evidence of some agreement; but it must be unequivocal and satisfactory evidence of the particular agreement charged in the bill.

Messrs. Blandford & Gose for respondent.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant, as executor of the last will of one Orley Hull, deceased, to compel said executor to perform an alleged parol agreement entered into between the plaintiff and said Hull, whereby he agreed to devise to her one fourth of his estate at the time of his death. Said Orley Hull and one Mary Hull were husband and wife, and plaintiff was their daughter. Mary Hull died intestate on the 11th day of December, 1886, at which time said parties were the owners of a large and valuable estate, situated in the territory of Washington, and mostly in Walla Walla county, all of which was community property. No attempt was made to administer upon the estate of said Mary Hull until March, 1890, at which time the plaintiff and one of her sisters, a Mrs. Swezea, petitioned for the appointment of an administrator. The estate at that time was, and from the death of Mary Hull had been, in the possession of the husband. A contest over the appointment of an administrator was had, which resulted in the appointment of one Winans, and an appraisement of the estate was made and returned to the superior court of Walla Walla county, which showed her estate to be worth less than $3,000. Upon the return thereof the plaintiff and her said sister began proceedings to have a large amount of other property, including the homestead upon which said Hull and wife resided, and other real estate, added to the inventory of said estate. While these proceedings were pending, said Orley Hull began a suit against this plaintiff and her said sister in the superior court of Walla Walla county, for the purpose of having said homestead, which had been obtained under the United States homestead laws, declared his separate property. A decree was rendered in his favor, whereupon this plaintiff and her said sister gave notice of an appeal to the supreme court. While they were perfecting the same it is claimed that the parol agreement in question was entered into between the parties, which the plaintiff contends was substantially performed by her. Said Orley Hull died on the 21st day of April, 1892, leaving a will in which he bequeathed to this plaintiff the sum of $500, and no more, of his estate, which was of the value then of $40,000 or more, and consisted of both real and personal property. He had taken a second wife, to whom he left one fourth of his estate, and the remainder of it was devised to two other daughters, one of whom was Mrs. Swezea, who had joined with the plaintiff in the previous litigation against him; said three daughters being his only surviving children. This action was first tried to a referee in the superior court of Walla Walla county, who found against the plaintiff, but his findings were set aside by the judge of said court and decree was rendered in her favor, from which this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant. Several sets of briefs have been filed herein, and the cause has been twice argued to this court. A number of difficult questions have been presented and ably argued on both sides, but we have not found it necessary to discuss all of them in arriving at a determination, owing to the view we have finally taken of the law applicable to the case.

The making and terms of said contract, as alleged by the plaintiff, were as follows: That during the pendency of the proceedings aforesaid upon the part of plaintiff and Mrs. Swezea to have the other property added to the inventory of their mother's estate, and of their appeal to the supreme court from the action brought by their father to have the homestead declared his separate property, her father proposed to her and Mrs. Swezea that if they would discontinue all further proceedings in the prosecution of said appeal, and all further proceedings to have said other property added to the inventory of her mother's estate, and would agree to a settlement and termination of the administration of said estate and the discharge of the administrator, and would give and turn over to their father all the right, title, and interest which they, and each of them, had in and to the estate of their said mother, with the full custody and management, control, and power of alienation thereof, and in no way interfere with or obstruct his full and complete management and control of the same, he would, on his part, devise and bequeath to the plaintiff and to Mrs. Swezea, each, by his last will and testament, a one-fourth interest in his whole estate at the time of his death; and acceptance and performance of this agreement by the plaintiff and Mrs. Swezea are alleged. It appears, however, that the only direct act performed was the signing of a stipulation by said parties to discharge the administrator, and terminate the administration of the estate of Mary Hull. But it appears that nothing further was done by either the plaintiff or Mrs. Swezea in the prosecution of the appeal from the judgment rendered in the action aforesaid, and that plaintiff lost her rights therein by reason of the lapse of time, and that thereby the decree which had been rendered in the superior court became final, and settled the title to the homestead tract in her father. It is conceded that neither the plaintiff nor Mrs. Swezea gave, or offered to give, their father a deed of their interest in and to any of the lands, and it does not appear that he ever asked for one. The record title to all of said lands stood in his name, and he at all times after the decease of their mother was in full and exclusive possession thereof. It also appears that several tracts of the remaining lands other than the homestead, and a large amount of personal property, were at various times sold by him, and the proceeds of one 80-acre tract were divided between the plaintiff and Mrs. Swezea; and it is contended by the plaintiff that by reason of her acquiescence in the sale of said personal and real property and a failure to object thereto, and by reason of the lapse of time, etc., the title so attempted to be conveyed by her father became perfected in the respective grantees, and therefore no other conveyance relating thereto can at this time be held to be necessary. It appears, however, that one tract, known as the "Eureka Flat Farm," which was also owned by her father and mother as community property, still remains and is a part of the property of said estate. As to this it is contended by the plaintiff that it was never understood by any of the parties that a deed from the plaintiff and Mrs. Swezea to her father was necessary to vest the complete title to any of these lands in him, and that, as he had never asked for one, and had always had the full and exclusive management and control of said real estate, and dealt with it as his own, the failure to execute such a deed, if one was necessary, should not bar her of her right to a performance of the contract upon his part at this time; and, furthermore, that if the court should hold that such a deed is necessary, she asks to be permitted to give one at this time. It does not appear that Mrs. Swezea is willing to give such a deed, but, if the contract can be regarded as a severable one so far as plaintiff is concerned, and has been sufficiently established in law, we could see no objection, under the circumstances of this case, to her giving such a deed now.

The making of this contract is disputed by the defendant, but little or no testimony was introduced to contradict the testimony upon the part of the plaintiff. The attack of the defendant was mainly directed against the validity of the contract under the statute of frauds re-enacted here, and the important question to be determined is whether there had been a sufficient performance of it, conceding that it was entered into, to entitle plaintiff to a specific performance thereof. The proof upon the part of the plaintiff was clear and explicit as to the terms of this contract, but the only performance of it upon her part was in signing the stipulation to discharge the administrator and terminating the administration of her mother's estate, and in allowing her appeal from the action aforesaid to lapse. It does not appear that her father did anything towards the performance of said contract, and under its terms there was nothing for him to do except to devise to the plaintiff and Mrs. Swezea one fourth of the estate of which he died seised. Upon the termination of the administration of her mother's estate, it appears that certain of the personal property was divided between the parties, of which the plaintiff received a portion; but the division of this personal property, and the further division between plaintiff and Mrs. Swezea of the proceeds of the 80-acre tract afterwards sold by their father, cannot be considered as a part performance of the contract, for by the terms thereof he was to have all of said property, both real and personal; and such division was, in fact, inconsistent with the contract. Nor were these matters claimed by the plaintiff to be a part performance. She claimed that the same was a gift to her, and that the expressed purpose of her father in giving said property to Mrs. Swezea and herself was to place them upon an equal footing with the other sister, to whom he had previously given property.

It satisfactorily appears to all the members of this court who sat upon the trial of the cause that some kind of a contract was entered into between the parties at the time alleged. The parties were at that time relying upon their legal rights, and undertaking to maintain their claims in the courts, and were proceeding adversely to each other; but upon the making of this agreement all of these proceedings were discontinued, and peace and harmony were established between them. By allowing said appeal to lapse, plaintiff lost valuable rights, for, while the question was then undetermined, under recent decisions of this court it has been held that a homestead acquired under the United States homestead laws is the community property of the husband and wife; and, if the testimony offered by the plaintiff in support of this contract could be considered as legally sufficient, or would show enough done to authorize its enforcement, a majority of the members of the court who sat upon the trial could not agree to set aside the contract, or find it otherwise than as testified to by the witnesses for the plaintiff, which would result in an affirmance of the judgment. One of the strongest circumstances in support of the making of the contract as alleged is the fact that Mrs. Swezea, whose interests were directly and adversely affected by it, if a valid one was entered into, was not called by the defendant to dispute it, or testify in relation thereto. The circumstances connected therewith all go to show that one was entered into, and that the plaintiff is acting in good faith in the transaction, for, if advocating a false claim, she would probably have fixed a different time for the making of the contract, and not one when Mrs. Swezea was present and participated therein; and, considered only from the standpoint of the apparent truthfulness of the testimony, the claim made by the plaintiff appeals to the court so strongly that relief would be gladly extended were we authorized to do so under the law. But it must be remembered that a just claim cannot always be enforced by the courts, and, furthermore, that it was the plaintiff's father who undertook to make this unequal and seemingly unfair disposition of his property, and the law recognizes such a right, generally, in the parent. The reasons which led thereto in this instance are unknown to us, and, of course, are none of our concern.

But, conceding that the contract was entered into as testified to by the plaintiff's witnesses, was there a sufficient part performance to avoid the statute of frauds? If not, and conceding, also, that there was a substantial performance upon the part of the plaintiff, it is difficult to conceive what more could have been done during the lifetime of the father to give it effect against the statute, unless the making of the will would have relieved it of the objection, even if afterwards revoked. But no definite time was fixed for the making of such will, and there was no proof that any will was made other than the one probated. The law is well settled that a party may enter into a valid contract to make a will in favor of another party, and also that a parol contract to make such a will may be sufficiently performed during the lifetime of the parties, so that a court of equity will compel a specific performance. But there is a conflict in the cases where the kind and degree of part performance necessary for such a purpose is considered. Some of the cases cited by the plaintiff directly support her contention that there was a sufficient part performance to avoid the statute of frauds. One of the strongest is probably that of Johnson v. Hubbell (decided in New Jersey in 1855), 10 N. J. Eq. 332, 66 Am. Dec. 773; although the facts in that case showed a greater degree of part performance than appears in this, for there deeds were executed, and the father obtained title to a tract of land by a conveyance from his daughter, which his son had conveyed to the daughter in pursuance of the contract to make the will. But while the relief asked was not granted in that case, the opinion holds that: "If one party to a parol agreement has wholly or partially performed it on his part, so that a nonfulfillment by the other party is a fraud, the court will compel a performance." It will be observed, however, that of the numerous cases to which attention is called in the opinion none are cited in support of this proposition. Vanduyne v. Vreeland, 12 N. J. Eq. 142, decided in 1858, also supports the contention of the plaintiff, although the court in that case found that there had been a partial performance of the contract by the other party. Another case is that of Maddox v. Rowe, 23 Ga. 431, where a father agreed with his son that, if the son would convey to him a lot of land, he would devise to the son two other lots of land. The court decreed a specific performance of the contract. In that case, however, the father undertook to give effect to the contract by executing a will which was held to be void. But the court considered it as evidence in support of the contract. We shall not undertake to review the cases cited by the plaintiff, but content ourselves with saying that none of the others to which our attention has been called are as nearly in point as the ones above mentioned. Many of them make use of the same general expression that a court of equity will decree a performance where a nonperformance will result in a fraud upon the other party, and that the statute of frauds was designed to prevent frauds, and not to facilitate them; and, so far as these general statements are concerned, they, in a measure, support the plaintiff's case as contended, for it appears that under this contract she has lost valuable rights beyond recovery, if the contract cannot be enforced; yet none of the other cases, when considered with reference to the facts involved, would support a case like this one. In many of them the action was founded upon a written agreement, and in others the contract was to convey specific property of which possession had been given during the lifetime of the testator, as in Bird v. Pope, 73 Mich. 483. The cases cited that do support the plaintiff's contention are overborne by the weight of authority, and the rule seems to be well settled that to enforce a parol contract to make a will there must have been at least some substantial thing done by the testator in his lifetime in pursuance of that contract. This seems to be required for the purpose of placing the proof of the contract beyond all legitimate controversy, and bears directly upon the question of the proof. The fraud to be prevented is the danger of the fraudulent establishment of such contracts, and this is the purpose of the provision of the statute; and the cases which hold that a performance upon the part of one party alone is sufficient seem to lose sight of this fact, and assume that the contract can as well be established by the acts of one party alone, against the statute, although the case of Vanduyne v. Vreeland, supra, holds that the defendant may admit the making of the contract, and yet make use of the statute to defeat it. If the contract is void as to the real estate, the plaintiff cannot enforce it as to the personalty either, for, being void in part, it is void as a whole. Ellis v. Cary, 74 Wis. 176, 4 L. R. A. 55; Pond v. Sheean, 132 Ill. 312, 8 L. R. A. 414; Gould v. Mansfield, 103 Mass. 408.

Some of the courts at different times have expressed a regret that the exceptions to the rules laid down by the statute of frauds have been established, and the disposition at the present time is very general against any further relaxation. By the weight of authority at this time the rule seems to be settled that, in order to enforce specific performance of a parol contract to convey land, possession must have been transferred. The Supreme Court of the United States in Purcell v. Coleman, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 513. 18 L. ed. 435, decided in 1866, strongly supports this doctrine. Pond v. Sheean, supra, decided by the supreme court of Illinois in 1890, holds that delivery is essential. Many other cases are cited in the opinion there rendered. Johns v. Johns, 67 Ind. 440, holds likewise; and the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Pugh v. Good, 3 Watts & S. 56, holds that delivery of possession pursuant to the contract is the test of part performance. We shall not call attention to all of the cases so holding, but there is another line which, while not directly passing upon this question, holds that a part performance by one of the parties is not sufficient, and that there must have been a part performance by the other party also. Some of them are Wallace v. Long, 105 Ind. 522, 55 Am. Rep. 222; Austin v. Davis, 128 Ind. 472, 12 L. R. A. 120, and Ellis v. Cary, supra. That payment and acceptance of the purchase price is not a sufficient part performance is now well settled by the later cases. Pom. Spec. Perf. Cont. § 112, and cases there cited. See also Gould v. Mansfield, supra, and Hale v. Hale, 90 Va. 728, in relation to parol agreements to make mutual wills, holding such contracts invalid where wills were made accordingly, but were subsequently revoked on one side. In this case nothing was done by Hull in pursuance of this contract. The possession of no property was transferred thereunder to any of the parties. He had actual possession of all of it except much the smaller part of the personalty, which was in the hands of the administrator, and in which Hull had an interest. This was amicably divided between the parties as aforesaid. But, as seen, such division and transfer were no part performance of the contract alleged by the plaintiff, for the terms of the contract did not call for it. If the making of a previous will in pursuance of the contract would not have been a sufficient part performance by Hull, then the nature of this contract was such that it would not admit of a sufficient part performance to make it valid, for there was nothing else for him to do in the premises. Conceding all that the plaintiff claims with reference to the proof, we are still forced to the conclusion, under the authorities, that she is not entitled to a decree for a specific performance, for we are not disposed to add to or extend the exceptions to the rule established by the statute to meet the seeming hardships of a particular case. The fault rests with the parties in not putting their contracts in writing. The rule should not be infringed as freely after the death of one of the parties as in cases where the contract was to be performed during his lifetime. If a period of years had been fixed by the contract for the conveyance of this property by Hull to the plaintiff, instead of a devise, and the parties were all living, under the overwhelming weight of authority there was not a sufficient part performance to authorize its specific enforcement. Why should the case be different, or more liberally viewed as to alleged parol contracts to convey by will? The party seeking to enforce it should be in no more favorable position certainly than where the conveyance was to be by deed, for in the latter case the claim generally could be more easily met and disputed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

v.
Lemuel N. JOHN, Plff. in Err.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. Section 7 of chapter 79 of the Code is as follows: "No owner or tenant of any land containing coal shall open, or sink, or dig, excavate, or work in any coal mine or shaft, on such land, within 5 feet of the line dividing said land from that of another person or persons, without the consent, in writing, of every person interested in, or having title to, such adjoining lands in possession, reversion, or remainder, or of the guardians of any such persons as may be infants, If any person shall violate this section, he shall forfeit $500 to any person injured thereby who may sue for the same." This statute is constitutional, and by the term "injury" means the wrong done the party by the violation of the statute.

2. The penalty prescribed may be recovered by the person injured in an action of trespass on the case in the form set forth in the opinion.

3. Plaintiff or defendant may demur to the evidence, and the demurrant must set out the whole evidence: and the court, unless it be plainly against the demurrant, and appears to be resorted to only for delay, should compel the other party to join in the demurrer without requiring the demurrant to make on the record any admission of inferences of fact: but it is for the court to deduce all inferences fairly deducible from the evidence demurred to.

4. By demurring to evidence the demurrant is now, under § 9 of chap. 131, not held to waive any part of his competent evidence; but where it conflicts with that of the other party it will be regarded as overborne, unless it manifestly appears to be clearly and decidedly preponderant. He admits the credit of the evidence demurred to, and all inferences of fact that may be fairly deducible from the evidence, but only such facts as are fairly deducible; and refers it to the court to deduce such fair inferences.

5. It is not necessary for the jury to find any hypothetical verdict for damages where, as in a case like this, the action is on a statute, and only for a forfeiture or penalty definitely prescribed thereby.

6. Where, as in this case, the statute prescribes the penalty or the sum to be forfeited, but not the form of action, debt will lie; or the form of action may be such as the particular nature of the wrong or injury may require.

7. Any person injured by the violation of a statute may recover from the offender such damages as he may sustain by reason of the violation, although a penalty or forfeiture for such violation be thereby imposed, unless the same be expressly mentioned to be in lieu of damages. Code, chap. 103, § 7.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Monongalia County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty and damages for mining coal within 5 feet of the division line between plaintiff's and defendant's land. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Statutory regulations of mining, so far as they are for the protection and safety of workmen, are the subject of a note to Consolidated Coal & M. Co. v. Clay (Ohio) 25 L. R. A. 848.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Okey Johnson and L. V. Keck, for plaintiff in error:

Where an indictment can be maintained or a civil action brought only by force of the statute, the substance of the statute must be set out in the indictment or declaration.

Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510; State v. Riffe, 10 W. Va. 794; Com. v. Hampton, 3 Gratt. 592.

There was absolutely no proof of any injury done to the plaintiff, and the statute does not permit the plaintiff to recover any damages unless he has been injured by a violation of the statute.

If the statute had been well pleaded it would have no application in this case, because according to the very terms of the statute the defendant had the necessary consent in writing to go across the line for coal, because the very deed under which the plaintiff claims gives the defendant the right to take coal from the very bank which the defendant was about to enter from his own land, to save him the trouble of draining the old entrance, which was full of water.

The said act of the legislature is clearly unconstitutional. Every man is entitled, not only to his own property, but to the free use and enjoyment of it, except where the public good requires that it or a part of it should be devoted to public use in which case just compensation must be made to the owner, or where the public good requires that the owner should be restricted in the use of his own property. It cannot come under the police power because that can never be exercised except for the public good.

There are certain vital principles in our free government which will determine and overrule an apparent and flagrant abuse of legislative power; as to authorize manifest injustice by positive law; or to take away that security for personal liberty or private property, for the protection whereof the government was established.

Calder v. Bull, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648.

The right of everyone to use his own property as he pleases for all the purposes to which such property is usually applied is unlimited and unqualified up to the point where the particular use becomes a nuisance.

Fisher v. Clark, 41 Barb. 329; Beckley v. Skroh, 19 Mo. App. 75; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Angel, 41 N. J. Eq. 316, 56 Am. Rep. 1; Wilkinson v. Leland, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 627, 7 L. ed. 542; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557; People, Manhattan Sav. Inst., v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611.

This act of the legislature which invades our sacred right of private property cannot possibly be held valid as an exercise of the police power of the state because it does not pretend, and it could not be pretended, that it was enacted for the benefit of the public under the police power. Its object is merely for a private purpose in which the public is not at all interested.

Varner v. Martin, 21 W. Va. 534; Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. v. Benwood Iron Works, 31 W. Va. 710, 2 L. R. A. 680; Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385.

The determination of the legislature as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts.

Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923; Smith v. Bivens, 56 Fed. Rep. 352; Fort v. Goodwin, 36 S. C. 445; Utsy v. Hiott, 30 S. C. 360; Sanders v. Venning, 38 S. C. 502.

The police power of the state can never be exercised except for the public good, to which private rights must yield; but under all circumstances, when the public good does not demand it, no legislature can invade the right of private property, either to take it or to deprive the citizen of the use of it or any part of it.

People, Kemp, v. D'Oench, 111 N. Y. 359.

Holt, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error by defendant, John, to a judgment rendered in an action of trespass on the case against him by the circuit court of Monongalia county on the 20th day of June, 1894, in favor of plaintiff, Mapel, on his demurrer to the evidence for the penalty of $500 as prescribed by the following statute: "No owner or tenant of any land containing coal shall open or sink, or dig, excavate, or work in any coal mine or shaft, on such land, within 5 feet of the line dividing said land from that of another person or persons, without the consent, in writing, of every person interested in, or having title to, such adjoining lands in possession, reversion, or remainder, or of the guardians of any such persons as may be infants. If any person shall violate this section, he shall forfeit $500 to any person injured thereby who may sue for the same." Code 1891, p. 668, chap. 79, § 7.

The defendant, by counsel, assigns the following errors: "(1) The overruling the demurrer to the original and amended declaration. (2) In refusing to require the plaintiff to elect whether he would proceed for common law or statutory damages. (3) In refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. (4) In refusing to arrest said judgment because the declaration contained no count under the statute for the forfeiture. (5) In entering a judgment for plaintiff on said demurrer to evidence."

As the declaration demurred to is based upon a statute of great practical interest in this state, therefore it may answer a useful purpose to give the last count in full, which is as follows: "And for that the plaintiff heretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of January, 1892, at the county aforesaid, was possessed and the owner in fee simple of a certain other tract of land in Cass district, in said county, containing —— acres, more or less, and under and upon which there was and is a large and valuable vein of bituminous coal; and the said defendant during all the time aforesaid was and still is possessed and the owner in fee simple of a certain tract of land in said county and district, and adjoining the said tract of the said plaintiff, and under and upon which said last-mentioned tract the said vein of coal continues and thereunder remains along and under the boundary and division line between the said tracts; and the plaintiff and defendant being so respectively possessed of the said tracts, the said defendant, to wit, on the 1st day of April, 1892, opened the said vein of coal on his said tract, near to the boundary and division line between the said tracts, and then and there unlawfully, wrongfully, and contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, did open, dig, excavate, work, and remove the said vein of coal up to the said boundary and division line between said tracts without the consent of the plaintiff in writing or otherwise; by reason of which wrongful and unlawful act of the said defendant the plaintiff was injured and damaged $500, and the said defendant thereby became and was and is liable to plaintiff in the said sum of $500 and to the damage of the plaintiff $500; and therefore he sues," etc.

The declaration contained three counts. The first one may be said to be a common-law count in trespass on the case for the damages sustained, case being used instead of trespass, as authorized by statute (§ 8, chap. 103). The second count is like the third count given above, with the additional averment that the opening was extended across the dividing line. By the statute sued on the penalty of $500 is given to the party injured. No part of it goes to the state, so that the action would not be in the name of the state. See Code, chap. 36. The first act was passed on the 3d day of March, 1834. The action of debt was prescribed. Acts 1833–34, p. 82. No specific mode of recovery is provided by the statute sued on, and therefore an action of debt lies, being the usual remedy. West v. Rawson, 40 W. Va. 480; Sims v. Alderson, 8 Leigh, 479; 1 Chitty, Pl. 16th Am. ed. top p. 125, and cases cited. But in such case, where the statute gives a right of action without prescribing the form, the action is to be adapted to the nature of the case, and modeled according to the distinctions of the common law. It may be an action of debt, assumpsit, trespass, or case, as the particular nature of the wrong or injury may require. Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason, 243, 290, Fed. Cas. No. 2,121; Com. Dig.; 3 Rob. Pr. 383. Any person injured by the violation of a statute may recover from the offender such damages as he may sustain by reason of the violation, although a penalty or forfeiture for such violation be thereby imposed, unless the same be expressly mentioned to be in lieu of damages. Code, chap. 103, § 7. This, however, does not of itself give the right of joining a suit for such damages with a count for the penalty. But in this case the court virtually instructed the jury to disregard the first count, and, judgment being given only for the penalty, the question of the addition of the first or faulty count does not arise. Code, chap. 131, § 13.

The court did not err in refusing to require plaintiff to elect between the two counts, for the reason already given. Such election could not be made, as the court instructed the jury to disregard the first count, and to find conditionally the penalty fixed by the statute. In this case, therefore, there was no occasion for the jury to find any verdict at all. All that was needed was for the evidence on each side to be set forth in the demurrer, as it is required to be certified under § 9 of chapter 131; and the court, in deciding the demurrer, would give judgment for defendant or for plaintiff, and, if for the latter, it would be for the penalty of $500 fixed by the statute. Generally, where the damages are to be assessed, the jury is not discharged, but find a verdict subject to the decision of the court on the demurrer. Either party, plaintiff or defendant, has a right to demur to the evidence, and the other party will be required to join therein, unless the case be plainly against the demurrant, and his object in demurring clearly seems to be nothing else but delay. If the court, in considering the demurrer, is of the opinion that the plaintiff has cause of action, but that the damages are excessive, the verdict may be set aside, and a writ of inquiry be awarded; and so in every case, where the court, if it followed the hypothetical verdict, must render what the evidence contained in the demurrer shows to be an unjust judgment, it may set the verdict aside, and call another jury to ascertain the quantum of recovery (see 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, pp. 831, 832 and cases cited); or it may, for good cause, set aside the conditional verdict and award a new trial. I think the practice with us is to treat the party demurring with common fairness; not to draw any unreasonable or farfetched inferences against him, or for his adversary, nor to restrict him to what may be called "necessary inferences" in his favor. See Hansbrough v. Thom, 3 Leigh, 147. Of course, in a case of conflict, the fact must be taken against him, unless overthrown by a clear and decided preponderance of evidence; but, thus treated, he assumes no risk but what is fair in such a case, and what he ought in reason to anticipate; nor is it more than he assumes on a motion for a new trial. It tends to promote the fair and speedy administration of justice without being subject to the charge of encroaching upon the province of the jury; for it is as old as jury trial itself.

3. It so happened in this action for the recovery of the one definite penalty prescribed by the statute in the given case that there was no room for the verdict of a jury. Such verdict was wholly useless. But, as they followed the statute, it could do no harm; therefore there was nothing for the court to set aside, and there could be no substantial error to the prejudice of either party in refusing to set it aside; yet the court, on proper showing, might have awarded a trial de novo. The question whether the plaintiff had sustained any injury in the sense in which the term "injury" is used in the statute could not, in the nature of things, have been submitted to or found by the jury. It was a matter of evidence, with which, in this particular case, they had nothing to do. Moreover, the term "injury," as used in the statute, is used to indicate that the person whose right has thus been violated is the proper one to sue for the penalty; not that the amount of damages is to be ascertained by a jury, for the statute itself fixes the sum forfeited at $500, and means in this case the violation of his right by reason of the violation of the statute.

But it is argued by defendant's counsel that the act is an infringement of the right of private property, transcending the legislature's constitutional power. If the defendant has the right to use his own land and coal mine for all the purposes to which such property is usually applied when, where, and how he may see fit, without limitation or restriction, his neighbor, the plaintiff, has an equal right in his adjoining tract. Upon each one is therefore imposed the correlative duty of so using his own land as not to injure his neighbor's or be hurtful to the commonwealth (see Haigh v. Bell [W. Va.] 31 L. R. A. 131); for government is instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community. Const. art. 3, § 3. The state claims to reserve the exclusive regulation of its own internal government and police, and such power is properly exercised by the legislature. Is this statute a reasonable exercise of the police power? (1) It is intended to secure private right by enforcing the correlative duty of so using your own land as not to injure that of your neighbor. (2) To preserve dividing lines and underground landmarks, and thus avoid uncertainty and confusion of boundaries in coal lands and the disquieting of titles. See chapter 60 on fences and § 27 of chapter 145. (3) It tends to prevent strife and litigation. (4) To provide for the safety of those working in coal mines by sufficient pillars of support. Under this head see the many provisions in the coal mine law (Appendix to Code, pp. 991 et seq.). This is no undue assumption of the right to apply the police power to a subject which does not fall within it, for regulations on all these subjects have long been recognized as wholesome and reasonable, and as fit subjects for the exercise of the police power, as tending to preserve the rights of the citizen and to promote the welfare of the commonwealth. The mining of coal is one of the largest industries carried on in the state. In mining, proper support and ventilation are necessary, and an ample supply of fresh air is stringently exacted by our law on the subject. See coal mine law (Code, pp. 994, 995, §§ 9–11). This is necessary for the health and safety of the miner engaged in a dangerous employment, and for that reason the public welfare requires it; but no proper system of ventilation can be maintained by any mine owner unless the area to be worked by him is isolated or bounded by a zone or rib of coal thick enough to support the roof, and to be thick enough to prevent the escape of the air, with no passways down through his dividing line which may prevent the due circulation of the air, and render due ventilation very difficult. The same may be said of keeping his mine properly drained as required by law, and impervious to water from adjoining mines and lands. The act of 1834 fixed this bounding zone between adjoining land owners at 50 feet, the present act at 10 feet. Thus we see that this rib of solid coal not to be mined into by either of the adjoining owners was to be contributed by each in equal parts, for the mutual benefit of each, for the protection of the surface, to secure independent systems of ventilation, drainage and workings, and in aid of an industry so great and widely diffused that the state as a whole is interested therein. Besides, the importance of having these unbroken ribs of support throughout the mining region is being realized as a state affair more and more as the mining of coal goes on. This regulation works no hardship on one for the benefit of the other, but is impartial, just, and reasonable, imposing a common burden for the benefit of all such owners. This regulation, in substance, has been in force for more than sixty years without complaint. This is a high degree of evidence that it is not an unconstitutional exercise of police power to require this natural boundary wall to be preserved intact. See 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 593 et seq.; Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. top p. 578.

This brings us to the evidence. Joshua M. Ross sold and conveyed to Jesse Everly, by deed dated 16th February, 1860, the land now owned by plaintiff, Mapel. In it he makes this reservation: "The said Ross excepts the privilege of coal for his part of the farm at the bank now in use." What Ross did not then sell, which he calls "his part of the farm," is the land now owned by defendant, John. As to the nature and extent of defendant's right to mine coal on plaintiff's land it is enough for our present purpose to say that the privilege to mine coal at the bank then in use was an easement annexed to defendant's land; the dominant tenement, to mine coal at that open mine on plaintiff's land, the servient tenement, which was only a privilege to take coal at a particular place for a particular purpose; that the dominant tenement does not adjoin the servient tenement where the defendant was driving his new entry, but it was out of other land of defendant, which adjoined the servient tenement at that point. This, in my view, is wholly immaterial. Defendant was warned by plaintiff not to excavate or dig into or through this stone coal division fence, this underground party wall, created and established by law; but he persisted until he had dug across the dividing line and 18 inches into the 5 feet left standing on the other side, requiring, as it appears, an injunction to stop him. If we are not mistaken in some of the leading objects to be accomplished which moved the legislature to enact this statute, then defendant was prohibited from mining coal in and through this neutral zone both by the spirit and the letter of the act. (1) By the letter, for the place where defendant had a right to mine coal was an open mine then in use; and if for any reason he had the right to drive a new entry into the coal, it could only be on the land of plaintiff. He had no right to break through the dividing line, the party wall between his land and the land of the plaintiff. Defendant was not the sole owner of the coal on plaintiff's land, was not the owner of, or one having title to, such coal in the sense in which these terms are used in the statute. He was interested in Mapel's coal bank to the extent of the privilege already mentioned, which, so far from constituting any consent in writing given by anyone for him to dig through the 10-foot dividing fence of coal, negatives any such right by confining his right of entry and mining to plaintiff's side of the dividing line. (2) By the spirit of the act, for they were two separate, distinct tracts containing a vein of the Pittsburg seam of coal 10 feet thick, shown to be quite valuable on plaintiff's land. And defendant shows no pretext or color of right to destroy its integrity as a coal property by digging away the dividing wall, and making it one mining property with his own, so far as drainage, ventilation, propping, ingress, and egress, etc., are concerned, to the very serious damages of plaintiff's land as a distinct coal plant. Such a seam of coal at such a place may be worth $500 an acre, and in such a case the penalty fixed by the statute cannot by any means be regarded as a harsh one. But with that we have nothing to do, for we find the law thus written.

The judgment for plaintiff on his demurrer to evidence was right, and is affirmed.

Elizabeth C. ESTABROOK, Plf. in Err.,
v.
J. C. ROYON, Guardian, etc., of Coral Willie Henderson.

(52 Ohio St. 318.)

No forfeiture of the estate of a life tenant accrues, under § 2852, Rev. Stat., from the failure of the tenant to pay the taxes on the land, in consequence of which the land is sold at delinquent tax sale, where, by reason of errors or irregularities in levying the tax or in making the sale, no valid deed can be made by the auditor to the purchaser at the tax sale.

(Williams and Bradbury, JJ., dissent.)

*Headnote by the COURT.

(February 5, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shelby County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to procure the partition of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. L. Wicoff, for plaintiff in error:

Courts are liberal in construing transactions in favor of the avoidance of a forfeiture. Forfeitures are abhorred in equity, and are never favored in law.

Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 167, 58 Am. Rep. 806.

This pretended tax sale on January 18, 1887, was absolutely void.

I. General rule.

The general rule of law is that the party in possession of the rents and profits of real estate, being legally and morally bound to pay the taxes thereon, will not be allowed to acquire title thereto by refusing or neglecting to pay the same and purchasing the premises at a tax sale, or subsequently acquire them from a purchaser at such sale. And this rule applies to all estates in land whether held for life, in tail, in fee simple, whether acquired by purchase or descent. Pleasants v. Scott, 21 Ark. 370, 76 Am. Dec. 403; Guynn v. McCauley, 32 Ark. 97, 111; Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 38, 45, 85 Am. Dec. 94; McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300; Coppinger v. Rice, 33 Cal. 408, 425; Bernal v. Lynch, 36 Cal. 135, 146; Voris v. Thomas, 12 Ill. 442; Busch v. Huston, 75 Ill. 343; Stears v. Hollenbeck, 38 Iowa, 550; Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. 331; Carithers v. Weaver, 7 Kan. 110, 122; Leppo v. Gilbert, 26 Kan. 138, 140; Duffitt v. Tuhan, 28 Kan. 292; Douglas v. Dangerfield, 10 Ohio, 152; Willard v. Strong, 14 Vt. 532, 534, 39 Am. Dec. 240; Williamson v. Russell, 18 W. Va. 612, 624; Perkins v. Wilkinson, 86 Wis. 538, 547; Smith v. Lewis, 20 Wis. 351; Avery v. Judd, 21 Wis. 264; Bassett v. Welch, 22 Wis. 175; Whitney v. Gunderson, 31 Wis. 379; Fallass v. Pierce, 30 Wis. 443; Newton v. Marshall, 62 Wis. 8.

The rule is well settled that the burden of paying current taxes is upon the life tenant rather than upon the remainderman, and therefore the life tenant cannot, by paying taxes or by redeeming from tax sales, where he has allowed the land to be sold for taxes, create a claim which he can enforce against the remainderman. Hagan v. Varney, 147 Ill. 281, 292.

A tenant for life cannot acquire a tax title to the defeat of the remaindermen. Stewart v. Matheny, 66 Miss. 21, 26.

So, he cannot acquire a tax title to defeat those entitled in reversion. Olleman v. Kelgore, 52 Iowa, 38.

He can acquire no right to the estate against the owner in fee simple. Prettyman v. Walston, 34 Ill. 175, 192; Varney v. Stevens, 22 Me. 331; Hughes v. Young, 5 Gill & J. 67; McMillan v. Robbins, 5 Ohio, 28; Cairns v. Chabert, 3 Edw. Ch. 312; Burhans v. Van Zandt, 7 N. Y. 523; Elmira v. Dunn, 22 Barb. 402; Defreese v. Lake, ante, 744; Jones v. Merrill, 69 Miss. 747, 752.

So, if a tenant for life suffers the land to be sold for taxes, and subsequently receives a release of the title acquired under the tax sale, such release extinguishes the title, and gives him no right whatever against the reversioner. Dunn v. Snell, 74 Me. 22, 24.

And his neglect cannot, under any circumstances, vest in him a title in fee against the reversioner after the termination of his life estate by forfeiture or otherwise, and thus enable him to take advantage of his own wrong. Patrick v. Sherwood, 4 Blatchf. 112, 113.

So, one who accepts the life estate takes it charged with the disability of destroying the estate in remainder to the same extent that the original tenant for life was so disqualified. Jones v. Merrill, supra.

The owner of the life estate cannot acquire an adverse right against the owner of the fee in and through his forfeiture to pay the taxes. Chaplin v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 231, 233.

In the above case the government was the purchaser at the tax sale, and the tenant for life subsequently repurchased from the government.

And a purchase by the tenant, or title acquired by him in pursuance of such tax charge, will inure to the benefit of the reversioner as well as himself. Phelan v. Boylan, 25 Wis. 679, 681, in which case the taxes were due before the commencement of the life tenancy.

It is the general proposition that if a trustee, mortgagee, or tenant for life, being in possession, purchases an outstanding title or encumbrance, he cannot apply it to his own benefit, but it in general inures to the benefit of him under whom he entered, or is considered as held in trust for the cestui que trust, mortgagee, or him in reversion or remainder. Phelan v. Boylan, supra; Bowling v. Dobyns, 5 Dana, 434; Morgan v. Boone, 4 T. B. Mon. 297, 16 Am. Dec. 153.

The established doctrine is that a tenant for life in possession so purchases for the benefit of himself and the remainderman or reversioner, and cannot hold it for his own exclusive benefit. Phelan v. Boylan, supra; Daviess v. Myers, 13 B. Mon. 513.

He can acquire no right or title to the land by a neglect of such duty which will defeat the owner of the fee. Stears v. Hollenbeck, 38 Iowa, 550; Anson v. Anson, 20 Iowa, 56, 89 Am. Dec. 514.

And the laches of the tenant for life will not af-

Stambaugh v. Carlin, 35 Ohio St. 209; Younglove v. Hackman, 45 Ohio St. 69.

By the plain language of the section the sale of the lands is essential to work the forfeiture.

These lands were listed in several tracts, and must have been offered for sale in separate tracts, but only a portion of any tract was sold for the alleged tax against such tract.

Is it not clear that under such a sale there can be no forfeiture of the life estate in the part not sold?

Is any kind of a tax sufficient to furnish the basis for a forfeiture of a life estate? Will an absolutely void sale be sufficient?

It is regarded by our courts as a valuable right to the owner of land that the delinquent record shall show the delinquency, and it must show it correctly, or any sale made of the land for such tax is void.

Nye v. Denny, 18 Ohio St. 246, 98 Am. Dec. 118; Kemper v. McClelland, 19 Ohio St. 308; Woodward v. Sloan, 27 Ohio St. 592; Younglove v. Hackman, supra.

In Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 434, the court holds that the sale must have been a valid sale in order that the deed shall pass title.

Lands cannot be claimed as forfeited to the state for the nonpayment of taxes without a strict compliance with the statute authorizing the forfeiture.

fect the party entitled to remainder. Jackson, Hardenberg, v. Schoonmaker, 4 Johns. 390, 402.

The reason why an owner of land is disqualified from purchasing it at a tax sale is that permitting him to become such purchaser would enable him to take advantage of, and reap a benefit from, his own neglect of a legal duty. Oswald v. Wolf, 129 Ill. 200.

One can acquire no rights against another by a neglect of a duty which he owes to such other person. Foley v. Kirk, 33 N. J. Eq. 170, 178.

In such a case the vendee's deed will be treated as void from the beginning. Dunn v. Snell, 74 Me. 22, 24; Duffitt v. Tuhan, 28 Kan. 292.

Where it is made to appear that it was the duty of the party to pay the taxes on the land, the disqualification at once attaches and a purchaser will not be permitted to derive an advantage from that which it was his plain duty under the law to do. Lewis v. Ward, 99 Ill. 525, 527.

If a tenant for life, after a sale of the property for taxes, obtains a release to himself of the right thus acquired, he takes under such release according to his title, and the remaindermen according to theirs. Allen v. De Groodt, 98 Mo. 159.

Having purchased the land for the benefit of, not only himself, but in law for the owner of the remainder, the purchase is equivalent to a purchase by the remainderman, and subjects the rights of the party to that provision of the statute which prevents a recovery where the land had been redeemed or purchased by the owner, and, the owner of the life estate purchasing the lands, the purchase inures to the benefit of the remainderman and entitles him to the same estate on the land which he had before the sale. Chaplin v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 231, 233.

Any sale which may be made of the estate for taxes, which it was the duty of the life tenant to pay, will only reach the life estate. Stovall v. Austin, 16 Lea, 700, 709; Nashville v. Cowan, 10 Lea, 209, 213.

So, one entitled to a life estate cannot, during the continuance of such estate, acquire an adverse title as against the owners of the reversion by such a purchase. Menger v. Carruthers (Kan.) 44 Pac. 1096; Watkins v. Green, 101 Mich. 493, 498; Austin v. Stevens, 24 Me. 520, 526.

Neglecting to pay the taxes for the purpose of causing a sale of the estate to enable the tenant for life to destroy the rights of the reversioners, would be to commit a fraud upon their rights, and if he purchases at such a sale he cannot thereby establish any title as a disseisor against the reversioner. Varney v. Stevens, 2 Me. 331, 334.

And when he receives a release of the title he will be considered as intending to discharge his duty by releasing the estate from the encumbrance. Ibid.

One who redeems land forfeited for the nonpayment of taxes acquires thereby no additional title, and one who buys land at a tax sale to which he claims title, which was encumbered with taxes, acquires no additional title but only removes such encumbrance. Jacks v. Dyer, 31 Ark. 334, 344.

A purchase by a tenant for life at a tax sale merely extinguishes the tax. Foley v. Kirk, 33 N. J. Eq. 170, 177.

The purchase operates, not as a valid purchase, but as a payment only. Johnston v. Smith, 70 Ala. 108, 118.

The purchase is but a mode of paying the taxes legally chargeable against him. Choteau v. Jones, 11 Ill. 300, 322, 50 Am. Dec. 460.

And the rule admits of no exception that a purchase by one whose duty it is to pay the taxes operates as payment and nothing more. Lewis v. Ward, 99 Ill. 525, 527.

Such a proceeding is but an indirect mode of paying the tax which it was his duty to pay without suit, and the law will not tolerate the acquisition of the title of another in this method by his own wrong. Le Roy v. Reeves, 5 Sawy. 102, 106.

And the transaction is regarded as equivalent to a payment, and equity will relieve as against the deed conveying such interest to him as a cloud upon the title. Chaplin v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 231, 233.

The rule would appear to be well settled that all persons who, by reason of their ownership of lands or otherwise, are under a legal or perhaps a moral obligation to pay taxes and assessments thereon, are precluded by the policy of the law from becoming purchasers of such lands at a tax sale, and in case of a purchase such party obtains no independent title, the purchase being deemed in law only a mode of paying the taxes. Oswald v. Wolf, 129 Ill. 200.

The purchase gives him no rights as against a third party by a neglect of such duty as he owed. Williamson v. Russell, 18 W. Va. 612, 624.

The turning point in all the cases is the obligation of the party setting up the tax title to pay the taxes. Oswald v. Wolf, supra.

An action for damages will lie by the remainderman against the tenant for life, for the recovery of damages sustained by him by reason of the life tenant's neglect to pay taxes. Wade v. Malloy, 16 Hun, 226.

By neglecting to pay the taxes during his tenancy the life tenant commits a wrong against the reversioner, and, if by so doing he renders the estate subject to a sale, the reversioner may have an action of waste for the recovery of the property wasted, and the damages occasioned thereby, or he may proceed by way of action on the case, in the nature of waste, for damages only. Stetson v. Day, 51 Me. 434.

Equity will interfere at the instance of a remainderman, or the party entitled in reversion as against the life tenant, to prevent the sale by him

Minshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action below was a suit in partition, brought by Royon as guardian of Coral W. Henderson, a minor, claiming his ward to be tenant in common with the defendant of the undivided one half of the premises described in the petition. The defendant answered that she is the widow of William Line, deceased, who died seised of the property, and, by his will, devised the same to her for life, or during widowhood, and at her death or remarriage, to their children; that she is in possession of the property under the will, having accepted its provisions; and that the plaintiff's interest in the property is simply as heir of one of the deceased children of the testator. The averments of the answer are not denied, but, by way of avoidance, the plaintiff replied, that being in possession as such life tenant, the defendant had neglected to pay the taxes on the land for so long that, on January 18, 1887, they were, on due advertisement, sold by the auditor of the county for the taxes delinquent thereon for the years 1885 and 1886, and did not redeem them in the time prescribed by law (Rev. Stat. § 2852), whereby her life estate in the land became forfeited to the next in estate. But the reply also states that on March 30, 1888 (over a year after the sale), the defendant deposited with the treasurer of the county, upon the warrant of the auditor, the sum of $269.10, and that Royon, the holder of the certificates of purchase at the tax sale, received of lands acquired by him at a tax sale, where there is reason to believe that such lands will be lost to the reversioners by reason of want of notice in the purchaser. Phelan v. Boylan, 25 Wis. 679, 681.

In Stansbury v. Inglehart, 9 Mackey, 134, where an estate was limited to one for life with remainder over, it was held that there was no jurisdiction in equity to decree a sale of the fee simple in order to pay taxes accruing during the continuance of the life estate.

The mere fact that the reversioner mortgaged his reversion, and in the mortgage covenanted to pay the taxes, is not of itself a release of the duty imposed upon the tenant for life. Jenks v. Horton, 96 Mich. 13, 16.

For the purpose of redeeming the land and of keeping down taxes, life tenants will be permitted to fell timber in such quantities and at such places as not seriously to impair the value of the inheritance. Cannon v. Barry, 59 Miss. 289, 304.

In proceedings to set aside a tax deed obtained by a tenant for life, which deed he has fraudulently refused to record, he should be required to place the same on record. Phelan v. Boylan, 25 Wis. 679, 681.

In case of the neglect of the maker of a trust deed or of the trustee thereunder to pay the taxes, any beneficiary may pay the same and seek contribution from the other beneficiaries, or claim reimbursements out of the trust fund, but he cannot permit the lands to be sold for taxes and acquire a valid legal title by purchasing in the certificates of sale. Frierson v. Branch, 30 Ark. 453, 464; Pettus v. Wallace, 29 Ark. 476.

Where a tenant for life neglected to pay the taxes and purchased at a tax sale, it was held that, after the termination of such life estate, the fee could not be claimed as against the reversioner. Patrick v. Sherwood, 4 Blatchf. 112.

And where the grantee of land under a tax deed, which was executed to him before the time allowed for redemption had expired, had a subsequent warranty deed executed to him by the tenant for life, it was held that the conveyance by such grantee merely transferred his life interest in the property. Little v. Edwards, 84 Wis. 649, 651.

So, where the tax suit was brought against the tenant for life alone, and the remaindermen were not made parties and did not claim under him, but by an independent title created by deed, it was held that the judgment in the tax suit bound only the life tenants, and not the remaindermen. Allen v. De Groodt, 98 Mo. 159.

In Burhans v. Van Zandt, 7 N. Y. 523, a tenant for life obtained by voluntary purchase the interest of one of the cestuis que trust, and became a cotenant with others in equity in a remainder secured to them upon a deed of settlement, and himself became the purchaser of the estate sold for municipal assessments and sought to hold the same for his exclusive benefit. The court held he was not so entitled, as he was bound to protect those who stood in the same relation with himself to the property, and that the sale inured for the common benefit of all.

Although it is the duty of the tenant for life to protect the property by the payment of taxes of all kinds assessed upon it by any authority, yet the law does not protect the estate of remaindermen or reversioners from the consequence of a forfeiture of the land to the state in case of a sale for taxes. Chaplin v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 231, 233.

Where a tenant for life allowed the lands to be sold for the nonpayment of taxes, and the government became the purchaser at a tax sale and afterwards resold to the tenant for life, it was held that no action would lie against the government under the statutes of March 2, 1891, 26 Stat. at L. 822. Ibid.

Where the assessments were mostly on unimproved property, and as to the productive property were for purposes which conferred as much benefit on the future estate as on the then present life estate, the court ordered so much of the property as was required therefor to be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the assessments and costs of the suit, with a reference to inquire and report what amount was necessary, the sale being ordered under N. Y. Laws 1855, chap. 327. Norsworthy v. Bergh, 16 How. Pr. 315, 321.

But the rule is otherwise where the party is under no legal obligation to pay. Pleasants v. Scott, 21 Ark. 370, 76 Am. Dec. 403.

If, therefore, the party in possession is not bound to pay taxes either legally or morally, he is not precluded from purchasing at a tax sale. Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. 331.

Where there is no legal or moral obligation cast upon such purchaser to pay the taxes, there is no principle of law or equity which precludes him from purchasing at the sale, even though he may be in possession at the time the assessment is made or when the land is sold. Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 38, 45, 85 Am. Dec. 94.

II. Tenant in dower.

A tax title acquired at a tax sale by one whose legal duty it was to pay such taxes, as a tenant in dower, will be set aside. Fitzgerald v. Spain, 30 Ark. 95, 100.

Where the property was listed as that of the widow, it was held that all that the purchaser obtained at a tax sale was the dower interest of the widow. Payne v. Arthur, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 784.

So, where a widow executed a warranty deed to a grantee under a tax deed, it was held that such deed did not convey more than her life estate, and charged the purchaser with the payment of the taxes and operated as a redemption from or extin-the money and surrendered the certificates to the auditor.

A trial was had and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, which was affirmed by the circuit court. After the determination of the case in the common pleas, defendant, Elizabeth Line, intermarried with one Estabrook; hence the change that appears in her name. On the trial a bill of exceptions was taken set ing forth all the evidence. From this it appears that the defendant had on February 16, 1889, become the owner in fee simple of the undivided one half of the land by purchase from the heirs of the other children, and that the plaintiff at the termination of the life estate of the defendant, would be the owner and entitled to the possession of the other half; that the land was in three separate tracts, and had been so listed for taxation in the name of William Line, no change having been made at his death; that only a part of each of these tracts had in fact been sold for the taxes delinquent on each,—that is to say, 7 acres out of a tract of 20 acres, 10 acres out of a tract of 40 acres, and 10 acres out of a tract of 41 acres. And it also appears that there were a number of irregularities in the listing and sale of the land. The south half of one of the tracts had not been returned as delinquent in any sum by the treasurer; and his return showed no reasons why the taxes on any of the tracts had not been collected, as required by § 1043, guishment of his tax lien. Little v. Edwards, 84 Wis. 649, 651.

In the above case the purchaser at the tax sale had acquired the interest of a widow entitled to dower in the premises, and the grantees' interests were held to expire upon the death of the widow. Ibid.

The pre-existing right of dower, no matter whether inchoate or perfect, will be barred by a valid sale and conveyance by a county auditor for the nonpayment of taxes. Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 430, 431.

Where the plaintiffs, who were the heirs at law of a decedent, claimed the land under title from their ancestor, and the defendant, who was the purchaser of the land at a tax sale occasioned by the neglect of the widow to pay the taxes, also claimed title under the ancestor, it was held that the plaintiffs required no proof of their title in order to compel a cancelation of the deed conveying the land to the defendant. Payne v. Arthur, supra.

Where land was conveyed to one in trust for his bodily heirs "to have and to hold . . . to the only proper use of [grantee] during his life," and was not to be conveyed or disposed of by him, "but enjoyed by him [and] firmly and faithfully held in trust for the sole use of his bodily heirs forever," it was held that the purchaser under a sale for taxes of the land which was forfeited under the Ohio statute for the nonpayment thereof, held free of the widow's right to dower, and that the subsequent sale by such purchaser to the heirs of the tenant for life did not reinstate the widow's possession so as to give her a title to dower in the premises as against the children. Tullis v. Pierano, 9 Ohio C. C. 647.

Where a widow, tenant for life of her deceased husband's land, failed to pay the taxes, and the land was sold, and the tax deed executed to the defendant, which was recorded four years afterwards, such widow having the right to redeem from such tax sale at any time within five years thereafter, under §§ 1181, 1191, 1208, Wis. Rev. Stat., it was held that the tax deed so executed by the purchaser gave him no title or constructive possession as against such widow, the five years given her for redemption not having then expired, and its legal effect as to her amounted to nothing more than a tax certificate of such sale. Little v. Edwards, 84 Wis. 649, 651.

In Walsh v. Wilson, 130 Mass. 124, it was held that the widow's right to dower in land mortgaged by her husband during his lifetime, and redeemed by the mortgagee, remained unaffected by the tax sale under which the mortgagee took a deed of release and quitclaim from the city.

A widow who occupies her deceased husband's residence with his children, some of whom are of age, is not bound to pay taxes which accrue subsequent to the husband's death and before the assignment to her of dower, and therefore if she purchases the property at a tax sale made after the assignment of dower, such sale will not, in the absence of actual fraud, be ordered to be set aside at the instance of his creditors. Branson v. Yancy, 1 Dev. Eq. 77.

In the above case, however, there was a dissenting opinion by Henderson, J., holding the widow liable as a life tenant and occupant.

In Blodgett v. Brent, 3 Cranch, C. C. 394, it was held that a widow would not be barred of her dower by a tax sale, either by virtue of the act of Congress laying a direct tax, or for county taxes, or by sale under a decree in the lifetime of the husband; and that the purchaser at a tax sale acquired only the interest of the person in whose name the assessment was made.

See also Linden v. Graham, 34 Barb. 316, 319, infra, VII.

III. Tenant by curtesy.

Under the Connecticut statute it has been held that it is the exclusive duty of the tenant by the curtesy to pay all taxes assessed upon real estate, and that he alone is personally liable therefor, and that only his property can be taken or subjected to a lien therefor, and that consequently the remainderman has no right or interest which can be injuriously affected by any such assessment, the statute imposing a lien for the taxes only upon such estate as the party has in the land, and not upon the estate which another may have in the same land. White v. Portland, 67 Conn. 272.

IV. Devisee for life.

A devisee under a will who owns a life estate in real property cannot acquire a tax title so as to defeat the claim of those who are entitled in reversion or remainder. Olleman v. Kelgore, 52 Iowa, 38, 40.

Where a foreign will devised an estate for life and such will was not probated in the state, and the devisee permitted the land to be sold for taxes and purchased at such tax sale, it was held that he acquired no title which would defeat that of those entitled in reversion or remainder. Ibid.

V. Position of purchaser.

Where the owner of a life estate neglects to pay the taxes assessed upon the land, and it is sold for valid taxes and under valid proceedings, the title passes to the grantee, and the only remedy of the remainderman is against the life owner. Watkins v. Green, 101 Mich. 493, 498.

If the heirs or those entitled in remainder fail to enforce the duty on the life tenant to pay the taxes, and the property is sold for the taxes, and a stranger bids it off, such stranger is not in any way concerned, nor is his title affected under the tax sale. Newby v. Brownlee, 23 Fed. Rep. 320, 322.

Where it was objected that at the time the lands were sold for taxes, and at the time of the assignment to the tenant for life of the certificate of purchase, she was the tenant of said lands for life

Rev. Stat. The advertisement as to the amount due did not correspond in amount with the delinquencies returned by the treasurer, being greater; it included a delinquency on a ditch tax, which was not in the return of the treasurer; and a large part of the entire delinquency embraced an assessment for a turnpike, an equitable part of which should have been paid by the remaindermen. Rev. Stat. § 2768. In fact the sale is admitted to have been void, and, as a consequence, no valid deed could have been made the purchaser at the tax sale by the auditor. The admission may be regarded as compelled by the course of decisions in this state. Stambaugh v. Carlin, 35 Ohio St. 209; Younglove v. Hackman, 43 Ohio St. 69; Nye v. Denny, 18 Ohio St. 246, 98 Am. Dec. 118; Woodward v. Sloan, 27 Ohio St. 592; Kemper v. McClelland, 19 Ohio St. 308. Forfeitures are a matter of strict right, and can only be claimed where the requirements of the law have been strictly complied with.

We see no reason why the same strictness should not be required to work a forfeiture of a life estate for the nonpayment of taxes, under the provisions of § 2852, Rev. Stat. as is required to work a forfeiture to the state, or to support a title acquired on a sale of delinquent lands. It would seem somewhat remarkable to hold that a sale, which, by reason of irregularities, would not support a title to a purchaser, nor work a forfeiture to the state, chargeable with the payment of the taxes, and that therefore the purchase of the lands at the tax sale by her brother-in-law, and the subsequent assignment of the certificate of purchase by him to her, constituted in law only a mode of payment of the taxes by her, and therefore the tax deed purporting to convey said lands to her was inoperative and void,—the court held that it could not be doubted but that the deed constituted color of title in such life tenant as it purported on its face to convey to her the fee, and although the circumstances would doubtless be evidenced as against her of bad faith in acquiring such color of title, yet her want of good faith could not be imputed to her grantees, nor could it in any way affect their rights, so long as it was shown that when they accquired from her their title or color of title they had no knowledge or notice whatever of any of the facts from which bad faith on her part could be implied, and that therefore the title or semblance of title vested in her by the said tax deed, and passed to and became vested in her grantees by her conveyance, and that, so far as they were concerned, such claim and color of title were made and acquired in good faith, and being to the fee, their possession under it was adverse to the other claimants and so adverse to the heirs of the decedent. Lewis v. Pleasants, 143 Ill. 271.

Where one took property under a devise to him for life, and gave in the land for taxation along with other land as "all his land," and the land was levied upon for taxes and sold for its full value, it was held that there was a general assessment of taxes against all his property, and execution was levied upon the particular land in dispute which was included in such general return, and that the purchaser at the tax sale got no better title than the tenant for life had, the proceedings not being in rem to collect taxes from the particular land but a proceeding in personam against such tenant for life. Gross v. Taylor, 81 Ga. 86, 88.

Where, in ejectment proceedings, the plaintiffs were remaindermen and their father was tenant for life, and the property was sold for taxes, and defendants claimed through mesne conveyances under the purchases at the tax sale for taxes which ought to have been paid by the tenant for life, it was held that the action lay, the three years imposed by the Missouri statute of limitations under which title must be set up not having expired between the death of the tenant for life and the commencement of the suit, such statute only running as against the remaindermen from the death of the life tenant. Allen v. De Groodt, 98 Mo. 159.

Where the grantee of a tenant for life, who has acquired the estate by purchase under a tax title which is defective, has made improvements of a permanent character believing that he has the valid title and purchases the fee simple, such improvements materially increasing the value of the inheritance, he is entitled, as against the actual owner who seeks relief in equity, to an apportionment. Foley v. Kirk, 33 N. J. Eq. 170, 178.

Where a judgment was recovered in a suit commenced by the collector of taxes to enforce the lien against the property of a married woman for unpaid taxes without making her a party defendant, it was held that it would not affect her interest in the property, and, as the marital interest of her husband in the property was not vendible on execution for his debts, the purchaser at the tax sale under a judgment acquired no title which enabled him to prevail in an action of ejectment against the husband. Gitchell v. Messmer, 87 Mo. 131.

The purchaser of an estate in remainder at a sale on foreclosure of a mortgage made subject to the life estate on which the remainder is limited, cannot claim a forfeiture of the life estate from the sale of the lands at delinquent tax sale, and a failure to redeem within the time prescribed by Ohio Rev. Stat. § 2852, where the omission occurred prior to the foreclosure and there is nothing to show but that the forfeiture was waived by the mortgagor. Chaffee v. Foster, 52 Ohio St. 358.

VI. The statute of limitations.

A tenant for life whose duty it is to pay taxes cannot acquire a title under the statute of limitations by a discharge of such duty. Higgins v. Crosby, 40 Ill. 260.

A life tenant who becomes a purchaser at a tax sale cannot claim the statute of limitations of one year under the Mississippi laws of March 2, 1888, p. 40, for the reason that he was under disability to buy, and set up the state's title as against the remainderman. Jones v. Merrill, 69 Miss. 747, 752; McGee v. Holmes, 63 Miss. 50.

The statute of limitations will not run in favor of a purchaser at a tax sale who was himself the party legally and morally bound to pay the taxes. Duffitt v. Tuhan, 28 Kan. 292.

VII. Decisions under state statutes.

Section 3845 of the Revised Statutes of Connecticut provides that when the real estate is in possession of a tenant for life, and another person is entitled to the "ultimate enjoyment" of it "such estate shall be set in the list of the tenant for life in possession" except when it is specially provided otherwise, and therefore the statutory lien for such a tax rests upon the estate of the tenant for life and not upon the estate of the remainderman, such being the express provision of § 3890 of the General Statutes, which imposed such a lien "for that part of his taxes which is laid upon the valuation of the said real estate as found in the said list when finally completed." White v. Portland, 67 Conn. 272.

The words "owner or possessor," as used in the would, nevertheless, work a forfeiture of a life estate to the one next in estate. Such a holding is not required by the reason nor by the letter of the statute. The language of the statute, as far as applicable, is as follows: "If any person . . . who shall be seised of lands for life, . . . shall neglect to pay the taxes thereon, so long that such lands shall be sold for the payment of the taxes, and shall not, within one year after such sale, redeem the same, according to law, such person shall forfeit to the person or persons next entitled to such lands in remainder or reversion all the estate which he or she, so neglecting as aforesaid, may have in said lands." By the terms of this statute the forfeiture is made to depend upon a sale for the nonpayment of taxes, and a failure to redeem within one year from the sale. Its language necessarily imports a valid sale, since an invalid sale is, in contemplation of law, no sale (cases above cited); and where there is no sale there is no forfeiture, and, consequently, nothing from which a redemption can be required. According to the usage of language, where a word is employed without qualification, it is to be understood in its integral, and not in a partial or negative sense. To illustrate, a contract for the execution and delivery of a deed is not performed by the delivery of a defective deed. And so, in Cincinnati v. Diekmeier, 31 Ohio St. 242, an agreement to pay a contractor in "assessments" was held to be an agreement to pay in "valid assessments." So that, in this case, the statute can only be held to apply where there has been a valid sale of the land. Where the sale is invalid, no title can be made the purchaser, and no loss of estate can, therefore, result either to the next in estate or to the life tenant. It is the loss that may result to the next in estate from the nonpayment of taxes on the land, which constitutes the reason and spirit of the statute; and when such loss cannot result from the neglect of the life tenant to pay taxes, the important fact is wanting on which the limitation in law, provided by the statute, can take effect and work a forfeiture of the estate of the life tenant.

The case of McMillan v. Robbins, 5 Ohio St. 28, is relied on to support the conclusions of the court below. But it is far, as we think, from so doing. It was the case of a sale made upon a valid assessment—no question being made as to the amount of the tax or the regularity of the proceedings by which it was levied and the sale made. The case held that the happening of the event on which the forfeiture is made to depend terminates the estate of the life tenant, and that the next in estate may enter without the judgment of a court declaring the forfeiture. This we accept as the law, although it was held otherwise in Johnson v. Pettit, 1 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 25, Storer, J., delivering the opinion. The provision of the statute is in the nature of a limitation in law, which cannot be relieved against by a court of equity. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 458. The occurrence or the fact terminates the estate. But the fact must occur before the limitation takes effect; a void sale is not within the limitation and does not, therefore, work a forfeiture.

Kentucky Revised Statutes, are so used as precautionary to embrace both classes, and for the better securing of the payment of the taxes assessed. Johnson v. Smith, 5 Bush, 102, 104.

The validity of the sale for taxes cannot be denied by the tenant for life, for the reason that under the Maine statutes the reversioner cannot dispute such sale until such time as he has paid or tendered the full amount of the tax together with the charges and interest. Stetson v. Day, 51 Me. 434.

The New York act of 1855, chap. 327, provides "for the due apportionment of taxes and assessments, and for the sale of real and personal estate to pay the same," and a sale made under such act by a judgment of the supreme court taken in an action wherein all having vested estates, either legal or equitable, were made parties, or proceeded against by a publication of notice as unknown owners, bars all contingent or unvested estates as well as possible interests which might vest in persons not yet in being, as well as vested estates, and under such act the purchaser by reason of the sale takes the fee simple absolutely. Jackson v. Babcock, 16 N. Y. 246.

Under the New York act of April 12, 1855 (Laws 1855, chap. 327), an action may be maintained by the owner entitled to real estate in fee against a widow, a dowress of the property, to recover an apportionment of taxes and assessments imposed upon the property, which assessments are a lien thereon. Linden v. Graham, 34 Barb. 316, 319.

All proceedings under the Ohio statute for the sale of lands for nonpayment of taxes are in rem and not in personam, and operate, if at all, upon the land itself, and not merely upon the title of the person in whose name it may have been listed for taxation. Jones v. Devore, 8 Ohio St. 430, 431.

The Ohio law which forfeits the estate of a life tenant for the nonpayment of taxes has been held constitutional. McMillan v. Robbins, 5 Ohio St. 28, 30.

In that case it was held that a tenant for life without impeachment of waste, who suffered the land to be sold for taxes, forfeited his estate, and that the reversioner was entitled to recover the same in an action of ejectment as against such tenant, the Ohio statute, § 14 of the act of 1824, making it the duty of every person standing seised or having the charge of lands, either as guardian, or executor, or by curtesy, or in dower, for life, or in right of his wife, or as agent or attorney having funds of his principal in his hands, to pay such taxes, and to cause the same to be listed for the purpose of taxing the reversioner having the right to redeem where the land is sold for taxes, which right cannot be devested by the life tenant depositing the amount of the taxes and interest. See also Tullis v. Pierano, 9 Ohio C. C. 647, supra, II.

Where land was devised to one for life with remainder over in fee, and during the life estate one of the remaindermen mortgaged his interest, and subsequently the land was levied upon for taxes and after advertisement the collector sold the right, title, and interest of the life tenant and the remainderman in and to an undivided seven-eighths part, and subsequently for another tax levied again, and after advertisement, sold the right, title, and interest of the life tenant and the remaindermen to three undivided eighth-parts, no notice of the sale being given to the mortgagee, who became the purchaser of both sales,—it was held, under the provisions of R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 42, §§ 4, 6, and chap. 44, §§ 8, 10, 12, that the sale was void for the reason that as to annual taxes the estate of the life tenant was first liable. Weaver v. Arnold, 15 R. I. 53. See also Little v. Edwards, 84 Wis. 649, 651, supra, II. E. W.

Again, it should be observed that under this statute it is only the land sold that is declared forfeited; so that where, as in this case, only a part of the land is sold to pay the taxes on the entire tract, the forfeiture extends simply to the lands sold.

It is argued that under the construction given the statute the land, by the neglect of the tenant, may be burdened with an accumulation of unpaid taxes, which the next in estate will have to pay when he comes into possession. This does not necessarily follow. Such accumulations can only result from the failure of the state, or purchaser, on a void sale for taxes, to pursue the proper legal remedy. Various methods are provided to the state for the collection of taxes; and the purchaser at a void sale is substituted to the lien and rights of the state; and, on a void purchase, may collect what is justly due from a life tenant as from a tenant in fee simple. Rev. Stat. § 2880. So that the supposed hardship is more imaginary than real. At any rate the injustice of forfeiting the estate of a life tenant for failure to pay an illegally assessed tax, or to redeem from a void sale, may well be balanced against such possible hardships to the next in estate. And it is these considerations that have uniformly influenced the courts to apply the law with great strictness where forfeitures are claimed. They are odious in law, because they necessarily work a sacrifice of the rights of the party whose estate is forfeited. Where equity may relieve the sacrifice is less; but where, as in this case, it cannot, and nothing but the pound of flesh will satisfy the demand, it is the duty of courts to see that all the requirements of the law have been complied with.

Judgments of the court below reversed, and cause remanded to the Common Pleas for further proceedings.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

RIDDLE, Appt,
v.
S. E. DOW et al. (W. C. Dickey & Company, Interveners).

THOMPSON NATIONAL BANK, Appt.,
v.

(.....Iowa.....)

A lessor's mortgage of his interest in crops raised by a tenant on leased land, and still in the possession of the tenant and undivided, gives the mortgagee a right paramount to that of the creditors of the mortgagor under garnishment proceedings subsequent to the mortgage.

(Rothrock, Ch. J., and Granger, J., dissent.)

(April 13, 1896.)

APPEALS by plaintiffs from judgments of the District Court for Crawford County in favor of the interveners in a garnishment proceeding to reach the landlord's share of crops grown on leased premises which were to be paid as rent in satisfaction of judgments against the landlord, the intervener claiming under a mortgage from the landlord. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nash & Phelps, W. R. Green, and Theodore F. Myers for appellants.

Mr. J. P. Conner for interveners, appellees.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The two cases are submitted together. The controlling facts are the same in both, and the district court was authorized to find the facts to be substantially as follows: In the year 1891 the plaintiffs recovered judgments against the defendant S. E. Dow, which are still unpaid. The defendant Dow rented to J. H. Griffin and J. R. Griffin by verbal agreements certain land for the year 1892, and was to receive from them as rent one third of the crops which should be raised on the leased premises, to be delivered in Dow City, about 3 miles distant from the land. The tenants occupied the premises, and proceeded to raise crops thereon. On the 2d day of September, 1892, Dow made to the interveners W. C. Dickey & Co. a promissory note for the sum of $400, payable on the 1st day of the next November, and to secure its payment executed a chattel mortgage upon the property, described as follows: "My undivided one-third interest in all the crops of every kind and description grown during the season of 1892" on land which was fully described and which was that leased to the Griffins as stated. At that time no division of the crops grown had been made. The small grain, consisting of wheat and oats, was in stack, and the corn was in the field, and all were in the possession of the tenants. After the mortgage was given, but on the same day, the tenants were garnished under executions issued on the judgments, and their answers were taken. The answers admitted that the garnishees were under obligations to deliver a share of the crops raised by them, but showed that no division had been made. Subsequently nearly 120 bushels of wheat, 320 of oats, and more than 2,000 bushels of corn were delivered by the tenants to the sheriff under the garnishments. A stipulation was then made under which the grain so delivered was sold, and the proceeds of the sale were paid into the court, to be appropriated by the judgments which should be rendered in the cases. The district court adjudged that the lien of the mortgage was paramount to the rights acquired by the garnishment proceedings, and awarded the proceeds of the grain to the interveners.

1. It may fairly be inferred from the record before us that the lease made by Dow gave to the tenants the sole possession of the leased premises during the terms of the lease, the exclusive right to possess and hold the crops which should be grown until they should be divided, and the right to make the division. The division of the crops actually made by the tenants and the delivery of a share thereof to the sheriff were voluntary on the part of the tenants in fulfilment of the requirements of their lease. No question as to notice of the rights of any party is involved in this case. The question we are required to determine is whether the mortgage given by the landlord to the interveners was effectual to create an interest in the crops grown upon the leased premises superior to the rights acquired by the judgment creditors of the landlord by virtue of the garnishments. It is earnestly contended that the landlord had no interest in the crops until they were divided and his share was delivered; that he could not mortgage a share of them until it was set apart to him; and that, as the tenants were garnished before that was done, the judgment creditors acquired rights which were paramount to those created by the mortgage. It is undoubtedly true that the authorities generally hold that, where a tenant on shares has exclusive possession of the leased premises, the legal title to the entire crop grown thereon and the right to possess it are vested in him until the share which is to be delivered as rent is separated from the remainder of the crop, and some authorities hold that such ownership is exclusive. It will be found, however, that in most cases of that character the landlord or person claiming through him was endeavoring to assert a right of possession as against the tenant before a division of the crops had been made, or that there had been a conveyance of the land before a maturity of the crops, and a claim made that the landlord's share did not pass by the conveyance. But the rules which control in such cases are not applicable to this case. To ascertain the fair scope and intent of a decision and the force which should be given it, attention must be paid to the very questions which required determination. The case of Rees v. Baker, 4 G. Greene, 461, may properly be regarded as the leading one in this state for the doctrine that the exclusive ownership of growing crops, of which a share is to be delivered as rent, is in the tenant, but no question of that kind was involved in the case. The landlord had leased to the tenant land on shares. The tenant plowed and cultivated it, and sowed fall wheat upon it. The wheat was frozen out during the winter, and, in the spring following, the landlord, without the permission of the tenant, took possession of the land, and sowed it with spring wheat. The court held that the landlord was a trespasser, and that the tenant could recover the value of his labor in preparing the ground for a crop. What was said in regard to the ownership of a crop, had one been raised by the tenant was not relevant to any issue in the case. The facts involved in Townsend v. Isenberger, 45 Iowa, 670,—the next case decided by this court,—which is alleged to support the doctrine in question, were substantially as follows: The owner of land leased it to a tenant, who was to deliver for its use one third of the grain he should raise upon it. Before the crops were planted a creditor of the landlord levied a writ of attachment upon the land. A judgment in the action was afterwards obtained, and before the crops matured the land was sold without redemption and a sheriff's deed therefor executed. After the attachment was effected, but before the crops were planted, and before the judgment was rendered, the landlord assigned the lease, and the controversy in the case was in regard to the ownership of the share of the crop which was set apart by the tenant as rent. What was said in regard to the ownership of the tenant was designed to show that the rent had not accrued and was not payable until after the purchaser at the sheriff's sale had acquired title to the land; hence that the case was controlled by the rules that rent reserved by lease, and not accrued, passes by a conveyance of the land, and that a purchaser under execution sale is entitled to the rent accruing or falling due after the execution of the sheriff's deed. It is clear that those rules have no application in this case. The cases of Rees v. Baker, and Townsend v. Isenberger were referred to in Atkins v. Womeldorf, 53 Iowa, 150, where it was said that, although it be true that the right of property in a crop grown on shares was, as between the landlord and tenant, in the latter until it was divided, yet that it was the "property of the tenant in the sense that the landlord may not enter upon the premises and take possession of the crops without consent of the tenant." The case of Howard County v. Kyte, 69 Iowa, 307, merely decided that a writ of attachment against the property of a landlord cannot be levied on growing crops of which he is to have a share as rent, for the reason that the officer has no right to take possession of the crop, and the proper method of reaching the right of the landlord to the rent is by garnishment. It was said that "the rent reserved, being a share of the crop, is the same as when the rent is reserved in money, so far as the rights of the landlord or his creditors to take possession are involved, and the tenant is in no manner in default until he refuses to deliver the share of the grain in compliance with his contract." But it was not said that the interest of the landlord in the crops raised was no more than it would have been had the rent been payable in money. In no case which has been called to our attention has a share of the crop to be delivered as rent been treated in all respects as though it were money rent. That it should not be is clear on principle. When rent is to be paid in money, the obligation of the tenant is discharged by the payment of the specified amount of money from whatever source obtained; and if a share of the crop to be grown, or its equivalent, is to be paid as rent, the requirements of the lease will be satisfied by the delivery of the share itself or by delivering an equivalent, as crops of a kind and quality equal to the share designated. But when the rent is to be paid by the delivery of a share of the crop raised on the leased premises, and no option is given to deliver an equivalent, the obligation of the tenant can be satisfied only by a delivery of the specified share of the crops grown on the leased premises. Nor can he be compelled to pay anything but the stipulated share, unless he fails to deliver it according to the terms of his contract. Johnson v. Shank, 67 Iowa, 116.

In a proper case a specific performance by the tenant of his contract to deliver a share of the crops as rent would be compelled by a court of equity. Whether it would be compelled in all cases we do not decide. The rule in regard to ordinary contracts for the sale of personal property is that specific performance will not be decreed where compensation in damages will afford complete and satisfactory relief. It was intimated, however, in Parker v. Garrison, 61 Ill. 250, that the delivery of a share of grain reserved as rent might be enforced as the execution of a trust. In that case the tenant had agreed to deliver as rent one half of the crops which he should raise on the leased premises, but it was to be paid in corn. He refused to deliver the stipulated share, and did not separate it from the remainder of the crop, but intended to sell all of it. He was enjoined from selling or otherwise disposing of the grain at the suit of the landlord. The court said that the landlord had an interest in the corn; that "it justly and equitably belongs to him." That "the defendant Garrison had received from him the entire consideration for it . . . and it was his plain duty to deliver the corn to the complainant." That case is an authority for the theory that the landlord has an interest in the crop of which he is to have a share as rent, before a division is made, which is more than a mere right to a landlord's lien, and which the court will protect. It should be remembered in this connection that the rule that the legal title to crops, a share of which is to be delivered as rent, and the right to their exclusive possession, are in the tenant until a separation and delivery of the rent share is fully recognized by the supreme court of Illinois. Atwood v. Ruckman, 21 Ill. 200; Dixon v. Niccolls, 39 Ill. 384, 89 Am. Dec. 312; Sargent v. Courrier, 66 Ill. 245. It is true it was said in Drake v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 63, that a landlord has not such an interest in the growing crops of his tenant as will enable him to maintain an action against a person who injures the crops. But the nature of the landlord's claim to the crops in that case is not shown. The point was decided without discussion by the court, apparently on the authority of Townsend v. Isenbery, supra. The case cannot, therefore, be regarded as in conflict with the views we now express. That a lease may be assigned as security, and the right to recover the rent reserved be thereby given to the assignee, was decided in Watson v. Hunkins, 13 Iowa, 548. This rule was followed in Lufkin v. Preston, 52 Iowa, 235, and 57 Iowa, 28. In the opinion filed on the first appeal in the case last cited the cases of Rees v. Baker and Townsend v. Isenberger, supra, were referred to, but the court said: "It has never been held that a landlord may not assign his interest in the lease, and thus invest his assignee with the right to secure the rent when it is in a condition to be set apart." The leases considered in that case provided that the landlord should have one half of the crop in the field at harvest time. The leases were assigned as collateral security, and afterwards, in March, and again in May, an execution was levied upon an undivided half of the corn growing upon the leased premises as the property of the landlord. A sale thereof was made, and when the corn matured one half of it was gathered by the purchaser, by permission of the tenants. It was held that the assignments, if not fraudulent, invested the assignee with the right to one half of the corn at harvest time. In Haywood v. O'Brien, 52 Iowa, 537, it was held that the assignment of a lease gives to the assignee the right to a landlord's attachment. The case of Stickney v. Stickney, 77 Iowa, 699, was for the foreclosure of chattel mortgages upon live stock, grain, and hay on certain farms. One of them was occupied by a tenant who had agreed to pay one half of the products, including all crops and fruits grown upon the farm, and hogs, cattle, and calves raised on it. It did not appear that there had been any division of the property, but the court said of that in which the tenant claimed an interest: "Of course, one half was the landlord's and one half the tenant's." That a landlord has an interest in crops of which he is to have a share as rent, before separation and delivery of the share, which he may mortgage or sell, has been affirmed in other states. This was expressly held in Howell v. Pugh, 27 Kan. 702. The particulars of that tendency do not fully appear in that report, but the statements of the case made on an earlier appeal, which is reported in 25 Kan. 97, with those made on the second appeal, show that the tenant was to pay as rent one half of the wheat and one third of the corn and flax raised on the leased premises during the term, the wheat and flax to be delivered in the half bushel and the corn in the crib. On the 8th day of July, 1879, the landlord sold his share of the crops, and three days later suits were commenced against him, and the tenant was garnished. At that time the flax and corn were growing in the field, and the wheat was in stack, but no division had been made, and the question to be determined was whether the sale by the landlord was valid and effectual as against the garnishment. The only material difference between that case and this is that in the Kansas case the sale was absolute, while in this it was conditional. In Potts v. Newell, 22 Minn. 561, it was said that the right of the landlord to a share of the crop which was to be paid him as rent was as clearly assignable as the right to receive a specified rent in money; and a mortgage of such share, made before its separation from the remainder of the crop, was sustained.

The interest of the landlord in the share of crops to be delivered by the tenant, where the latter has the legal title and right of possession until separation and delivery, is similar to that of the tenant in the share he is to receive when possession of the crop is retained by the landlord until division. In Yates v. Kinney, 19 Neb. 275, it appeared that the tenant, Kinney, was to deliver to his landlord as rent one third of the crops to be raised on the leased premises, but the crops were to be considered the property of the landlord until they were divided. The tenant executed mortgages upon two thirds of the crops before they were divided, and while they were growing. The court said: "It is evident that Kinney had some interest in the crops. The fact that the extent of that interest depended upon his compliance with the terms of his lease would not deprive him of the right to sell or mortgage it." The court also held that, where the tenant had the right to assign his lease or sell his share of the crop raised on the leased premises, it logically followed that the same rights or interests might be mortgaged. In Hammock v. Creekmore, 48 Ark. 264, it was said that a party who works land for a share of the crops raised thereon, under an agreement by which the landlord owns the entire crops until division, "may sell or mortgage his contingent interest, just as he may assign his wages to be hereafter earned." The doctrine of these cases was recognized in Meacham v. Herndon, 86 Tenn. 366. It was said in Horseley v. Moss, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 341, that a land owner who furnished the land, teams, food for teams, and tools, for which he was to receive one half of the crops raised on the land, had more than a landlord's lien on the crops; that he had a specific interest in the crops themselves. In Ferrall v. Kent, 4 Gill, 209, it was said of a lease which provided that the tenant should give the landlord one half of everything made on the leased premises, and carry all the crops to market, and pay the landlord one half of the proceeds after they were sold, that it vested in the parties to it a joint interest in the crops. It is well settled that in this state valid mortgages of personal property, not in existence until after the mortgage is given, are valid. It was said in Lawrence v. McKenzie, 88 Iowa, 440, that the "general rule is that, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, any personal property which is capable of being sold, and which has an actual or prospective existence, may be mortgaged." That rule is in force in this state. Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Robinson, 83 Iowa, 568, 14 L. R. A. 126. In the case last cited it was said that the power to sell an account for money due cannot be questioned; that an interest in such an account less than the unqualified ownership of it may be transferred, and that a valid mortgage may be given on a claim for money not earned. When the mortgage in question was given, the small grain grown upon the leased premises was matured and in stack, and the corn must have been nearly, if not quite, full grown. The description in the mortgage was sufficient, and when the division was made the mortgage attached to the landlord's share thus ascertained. Johnson v. Rider, 84 Iowa, 53; Lufkin v. Preston, 52 Iowa, 235. See also Melin v. Reynolds, 32 Minn. 52; Potts v. Newell, 22 Minn. 562; Zehner v. Aultman, 74 Ind. 24; Sims v. Mead, 29 Kan. 125. In Potts v. Newell, supra, it was held that a mortgage upon "all the right, title, and interest" of the landlord in a crop to be grown, of which he was to have a share as rent, attached the instant the share was set apart, and was superior to the levy of an execution made after the mortgage was executed, but before the share was separated. It is the law in this state that no lien is obtained by the process of garnishment, but only a right to proceed against the garnishee personally. Clark v. Raymond, 86 Iowa, 667.

According to numerous decisions of this court, the mortgage in question must have attached to the landlord's share at the moment it was ascertained and set apart, if it did not attach before; and, since the garnishment did not create a lien, the mortgage became a first lien upon the property in controversy. The case of Orcutt v. Moore, 134 Mass. 48, 45 Am. Rep. 278, is relied upon as in conflict with the rule we have announced, but we do not think that it is. The lease involved in that case provided that the tenant, Bailey, should "carry on the farm at the halves," and he was to leave at the end of the term "as much hay as he found there when he took the farm." In commenting on the lease the court said: "It is not stated whether this hay was to be hay raised on the farm, or other hay of equal quality; whether the crops were to be divided in kind, or whether Bailey could sell them, accounting for one half of the proceeds; and the evidence bearing on these questions is not stated." The court said that on the case thus made it could not be said as a matter of law that the parties to the lease were tenants in common. When read in connection with the facts to which the court refers, its conclusion appears to be in harmony with the views we have expressed, for in this case it is not shown that the obligation of the tenant to deliver a share of the crops as rent could be discharged by paying an equivalent in crops grown elsewhere than on the leased premises, or in money. On the contrary, it appears that the lease was designed to give each party a share of the crops actually grown on the leased premises. That the landlord may sell the rent for the land at any time is not to be questioned. If he can sell all he can sell a part, especially when it is readily ascertainable; and if he can make an absolute sale it follows that he can make a conditional one. The mortgage in controversy was a conditional sale of the landlord's share of the crops which had been grown, and was to be delivered according to the terms of the lease. What right or interest the mortgage would have conveyed had a share of the crops grown not been delivered need not be determined. The conclusions which reason and authority demand are that the landlord had a mortgagable interest in the crops in controversy when the mortgage was given; that the interest was made definite and certain when his share was separated and determined; that the mortgage fully attached to that share when it was thus ascertained if it had not been operative before; that as the mortgage was given before the garnishment was effected, the latter was subject to the rights conferred by the former.

It follows that the judgments of the District Court were right, and they are therefore affirmed.

Deemer, J., concurring specially:

I agree with the minority opinion on the question as to the interest of the landlord in a share of the crops grown on the leased premises. I do not think he has such a vested or potential interest in the share to be set apart to him as rent that he may make a mortgage which will presently carry the undivided one third of the property growing upon the land. But I do think that he has a lien upon the crops which may finally ripen into a title of an aliquot part thereof, and that, when the third is delivered to or set apart for the landlord in accordance with the terms of the lease, then his title becomes perfect. Now, it is held in this state that one may make a mortgage of property to be acquired in the future which will be valid, and which I think will take precedence of a garnishment of him who holds the property for the mortgagor. In the case of Scharfenburg v. Bishop, 35 Iowa, 60, we said: "By the strict common-law rule, it is doubtless true that a party could not mortgage property, not then in esse, so as to vest the title in the mortgagee when the property should come in esse. But at civil law he could. . . . Courts of equity, and under our practice courts of law also, will recognize the rights of such mortgagee, and enforce them as against all persons having notice of them." If it does not at the common law amount to a technical legal mortgage, it is at least an equitable mortgage. Of course, it is necessary that such future-acquired property shall be capable of identification. See also, on this same point, Brown v. Allen, 35 Iowa, 306; Fejavary v. Broesch, 52 Iowa, 88, 35 Am. Rep. 261; Dunham v. Isett, 15 Iowa, 284; Stephens v. Pence, 56 Iowa, 257; Phillips v. Both, 58 Iowa, 499; Hughes v. Wheeler, 66 Iowa, 641. In the case last cited we held that a mortgage drawn with the intention of covering future-acquired property which was in existence, but not the property of the mortgagor, will be valid as to such property when acquired. And we also held that the mortgagee under such a mortgage was entitled to the possession of the property as against a purchaser from the mortgagor. There is no question but that the description of the property in controversy is sufficient to cover the property. Indeed, the property is specifically described as that growing upon certain land during the year 1892. It could scarcely be more definitely described, and it would be difficult to make a description which would more clearly indicate that the mortgagor intended to convey his interest in that crop, no matter when acquired. It follows, then, that as soon as the property was set apart by the tenant the mortgage attached to it, and that the mortgagee then had a perfect lien upon and was entitled to the property or to its proceeds when sold, under the stipulation in this case.

The garnishing creditor acquired no greater rights against the mortgagee than the mortgagor would have had had he brought the suit, nor are his rights against the garnishee, the tenant, any different than those held by the garnishee against the mortgagee. In a contest between the garnishee, who was the tenant, and the mortgagee there ought to be no doubt about the outcome. When the property was set apart by the tenant, who was garnished by a judgment creditor of the landlord, who was the mortgagor, the mortgage immediately fastened itself upon it, and the tenant held it as the property of the landlord, subject to the mortgage made to the interveners Dickey & Co. The proceedings by garnishment gave the plaintiffs no lien upon the property. They simply succeeded to the rights of the landlord, Dow, against the tenant, in and to the property raised upon the leased premises, and they have no other or greater rights against the interveners Dickey & Co. than Dow would have had. I desire to say again, in order that my position may not be misunderstood, that no question as to the sufficiency of description or notice to the creditors in the garnishment is made. Moreover, no such question could be in the case, because the mortgagor was not in possession when he gave the mortgage. In the case of Jessup v. Bridge, 11 Iowa, 572, 79 Am. Dec. 518, we held a mortgage on the future earnings of a railway company was prior and superior to the rights of judgment creditors of the railroad company under garnishment proceedings. In view of these well-settled rules, it seems clear to us that the mortgage of the interveners is superior to the claim of plaintiffs in their garnishment proceedings, and that it is not necessary to determine what interest a landlord has in growing crops of which he is to receive a share as rent for the use of his lands. There is no occasion to determine whether the interveners' rights under their mortgage are equitable or legal, for they pleaded the facts necessary to entitle them to recover, and proved without objection all that is required to give them the relief they prayed. An error as to the choice of form will not, under our reformed procedure, defeat them.

Another rule tends to support the interveners in their claim. The mortgage under which they claim contained the usual covenants of warranty, and correctly described the property intended to be conveyed. Now, it seems to be well settled that if a mortgagor who has no title, or whose title fails, afterwards acquires it, it inures to the mortgagee. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 101. Now, when the property was set apart by the tenant, in accordance with the terms of the lease, the title vested in the landlord, and immediately inured to W. C. Dickey & Co., the mortgagees. Under the doctrine announced in the minority opinion, there was nothing the judgment creditor could get until the property was set aside by the tenant for the landlord had no interest in it. Neither the mortgagee nor the judgment creditor by virtue of his garnishment had any claim against, right to, or interest in the property until set apart. When set apart, their respective interests in it, if they had any, immediately vested; but as the mortgage was first in point of time, it should be given priority. This is the most favorable attitude for the judgment creditors, and it seems to me that it gives them no standing in this controversy. But as it is well settled that a garnishment creates no lien, and that the mortgage does, even when the property is subsequently acquired, it follows as a necessary conclusion that the mortgagee should be protected. On these grounds I vote to affirm, and as the majority reach this conclusion, although by a somewhat different course of reasoning, it follows that the judgment is affirmed.

Granger, J., dissenting.

The majority opinion closes with a holding that reason and authority demand a conclusion that the landlord had a mortgageable interest in the crops in controversy when the mortgage was given. Regarding the conclusion as a clear misapprehension of authority, and of at least doubtful support in reason, I dissent from it. The proposition, briefly stated, is: Where a landlord leases land, and is to receive for his rental one third of the grain raised thereon, to be delivered at another place than on the land, and there is no relationship between the landlord and tenant, as that of tenants in common, has the landlord such an interest in the specific grain he will be entitled to receive that he can mortgage the same, and the mortgage be effective, before the grain is set apart for him? I think the authorities are, in this state, on principle, conclusive of the question. I do not see how language can be more so. In Rees v. Baker, 4 G. Greene, 461, it is true the question is but incidentally involved, but it is there said, speaking of the rental: "This share was in the nature of rent, and until it was delivered the exclusive ownership of the growing crop was in the tenant." I cannot imagine an interest the landlord could have except ownership and a lien. That he has the latter no one doubts. The case puts the ownership exclusively in the tenant until set apart. Townsend v. Isenberger, 45 Iowa, 680, is also cited in the majority opinion. I regard the case as a very conclusive test of the question, and its facts should be well in mind. It presents fairly the question whether or not a landlord has any interest in a growing crop that is assignable. In that case the landlord assigned his lease to the plaintiff, which would convey to the plaintiff every assignable interest he had. After the landlord had made such assignment, his land was sold on execution, and the case settled the question whether anything passed to plaintiff by the assignment of the lease. Speaking of that question, it is said: "The share of the crops reserved by the lease to the land owner is to be regarded as rent. . . . The owner of the land acquired no property in the part of the crop reserved for rent until it was set apart to him by the tenant, the ownership of the tenant continued until that time." If the conclusive language of Rees v. Baker was to be doubted as authority because not applicable directly to the issues, the question was certainly involved in Townsend v. Isenberger, and the same conclusive language is there used, and Rees v. Baker is cited in support of it, as well as other authorities. The majority opinion evades the force and language of that opinion by assuming that what is said was designed to show that the rent had not accrued and was not payable until the purchaser at the sheriff's sale had acquired title to the land. I must and do insist that the point ruled is that, before the rental was set apart, the landlord had no property therein that he could assign. The contention of ownership arose after the grain was set apart in a granary for the legal owner, so that the question was fairly presented whether or not the assignment was of validity to transfer title when made, or became afterwards effective, when the title would pass by the setting apart. It is there held that the assignee took no property by the assignment, not because the rent had not accrued when the purchaser took his title to the land, but for no other reason than that the "owner of the land acquired no property in the part of the crop reserved until it was set apart to him." It is in the same connection said, "The ownership of the tenant continued until that time." If the right of the landlord to assign the crop is not denied in that case for the sole reason that he had no ownership as a basis for it, and that the tenant was the owner, then it is not the province of language to express such a holding. The doctrine of these cases is followed in Atkins v. Womeldorf, 53 Iowa, 150, also cited in the majority opinion; and in fixing a rule for the protection of a landlord so that his interest may not be lost to him to benefit the creditors of the tenant it distinguishes, but in no way denies, the rule as stated in Townsend v. Isenberger. It gives to the landlord a protection against the seizure by such creditors because of his landlord's lien. The case recognizes the rule of the other cases. Mr. Justice Rothrock wrote the opinion in the case of Atkins v. Womeldorf, and also in Howard County v. Kyte, 69 Iowa, 307. It is there said: "When land is rented on shares, the tenant is the exclusive owner of the crop while growing, and the landlord has no control over it, nor title to the part of the crops reserved as rent, until it is set apart to him." It cites the former cases, and then says: "It is true that the landlord has a lien for the rent reserved, but he has neither title nor right of possession of the crop while growing." It is beyond a peradventure that the cases fix the right of a landlord in a growing crop as a lien merely, and not an ownership. It is true that in some of the cases the language relied on is used by way of illustration or argument, but it is significant in this: that at all times, whether treating of the right of the landlord to assign the crop reserved as rent or of its use in other ways, the same thought or rule is observed,—that his interest is a lien, and not an ownership that he can convey. In Drake v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 63, crops had been injured by defendant, and the question of the plaintiff's right to recover damages therefor was presented, he being the landlord; and it is said: "A landlord has no such interest in the growing crops of his tenant as to enable him to maintain an action against a person who injures the crop." This holding is based on Townsend v. Isenberger, and the reason for the holding must be that the landlord had no property interest to authorize the action. It is the law of Iowa, in view of the majority opinion, that a landlord has such a property interest in the growing crop that he may assign or mortgage it; but if some person shall destroy that interest he may not recover, for the reason that he has no interest that will permit it. I think ours is the only state in the Union to sustain such a rule. Our own holding ought to settle this question, I think, independent of reason or other authorities. If they announce a bad rule, we should meet the situation frankly, and overrule them, and not attempt to distinguish on principle where there is no difference.

It is said that a lease may be assigned, and the right to recover the rent reserved to be given to the assignee. The rule is not doubted. It is no more than to say that the landlord may assign his right. That he can assign his right to the rent, whether payable in money or other property, is not, to my knowledge, questioned. The assignee can take the place of the assignor. When the rent is payable, he can receive it or enforce payment precisely as the landlord could have done. But that is not the question we are considering. It may further be conceded, for the purposes of the case, that he can mortgage the debt,—that is, the chose in action. But that does not mean that he can pledge the specific property with which the debt is to be paid until it is his. I may also concede that a landlord can pledge the rental in the growing crops, and that, as between himself and his pledgee, if he afterwards acquires the title, the pledge will be valid. But not more so than if one should sell or mortgage property in which he confessedly had no interest. If he should afterwards acquire the title, it would inure to the benefit of the vendee or mortgagee. This is the rule as to real estate. Miller's Code, § 1931; Rice v. Kelso, 57 Iowa, 115 and 119. As to personal property, see Jones, Chat. Mortg. 4th ed. § 101. I submit that this court has held, in the cases cited, that a landlord may not assign his interest in a growing crop; that he has no interest therein that could be made the subject of a levy; and that he has no such interest therein that, if it is destroyed, he can maintain an action for damages; and that all such holdings are, in terms, based on the single fact that he has no ownership in the crop until it is set apart. If this is true, I am led to inquire, What is there to which a mortgage can attach? The majority refer to Parker v. Garrison, 61 Ill. 250. It is, in my judgment, without the slightest bearing on the question. In that case the tenant was insolvent, and, after the rental was due, he was removing it, and refusing to set apart the rental according to the contract. The action was to enforce specific performance of the contract by injunction. It simply held the holding of the property, after the time for delivery, was a trust. That was because the tenant had, after the debt was due, refused to deliver the crop in payment as he had agreed to do. It is said in the opinion that the rental share justly and equitably belonged to the landlord, and that is true; and the suit was to compel a specific performance, so that he might have the legal title. The majority omit to quote from the same case the significant remark as a basis for equitable cognizance, as indicating the thought of the court as to the legal title, that "the remedy by replevin, at least, would have been doubtful and uncertain from the difficulty of showing a legal title in the specific property, there having been no delivery;" and the corn was at the time undivided. In Woodruff v. Adams, 5 Blackf. 317, 35 Am. Dec. 122, in considering the question of trespass to the real estate, it is held that the landlord's right was to receive a portion of the crop after severance, and other land,—which is precisely this case, —as he was not jointly interested with the producer in the crop while it was growing. It is there said: "His share was in the nature of a rent, and until that was delivered the exclusive ownership of the crop was in the raiser of it." In Howard County v. Kyte, supra, this court said: "The rent reserved, being a share of the crop, is the same as when the rent is reserved in money, so far as the rights of the landlord or his creditors to take possession are involved." The words, because of the nature of the case, are used with a limitation as to persons, but they strengthen the oft-repeated holding that the landlord has no ownership. It means that the landlord's right in the growing crop is the same as his right to money to be paid as rent, so far as concerns his right to sell or pledge it. This exact question has received consideration by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Orcutt v. Moore, 134 Mass. 48, 45 Am. Rep. 278. I think that here also the majority have perverted the reasoning and conclusion of the case. After a careful discussion of this and kindred questions, speaking of the interest of the landlord in the crop, it is said: "Whether he has any potential interest depends on the contract, which may be ascertained by the jury. If the contract is, that the specific products are to belong to the parties jointly, and are to be divided, he has such potential interest; if the contract is, that the lessee is to pay, as rent, a share of the crops, or its equivalent, he would have no interest in any specific property so that he could sell it, though he has a claim for rent payable at the stipulated time." It seems to me that the language is not susceptible of misconstruction. Its conclusiveness is strengthened by the facts and reasoning. In that state, if the contract is such that the landlord and tenant are tenants in common, the rule is different. No such relationship is claimed in the case at bar. It is held in Sunol v. Molloy, 63 Cal. 369, that the landlord and tenant were tenants in common, and that a mortgagee of the tenant could not hold the entire crop. Such a rule is not to be disputed. The fact of the tenancy in common brings the case in line with the Massachusetts case.

The only conflict of authority that I have discovered is because of holdings in Kansas and Minnesota. In Howell v. Pugh, 27 Kan. 702, some language, used rather argumentatively than otherwise, in considering the principal question in the case, recognizes the right of a landlord to sell his rental share of the crop. The case is somewhat in doubt as to the precise nature of the contract, but what is said is without a citation of authorities, and gives to the landlord a property in the growing crop, which is certainly against the express holdings in this state, and the great weight of authority. In the Minnesota case (Potts v. Newell, 22 Minn. 561), what is said as to the right to mortgage the rental share of the crop is without reference to authorities on the subject. It seems to be the thought of the opinion that the legal title would not pass until the share was separated, which is the recognized rule; and that the landlord would have the right to receive the share in the future when separated, which is also the rule. It is also said that the right of the landlord "was as clearly assignable as the right to receive a specified rent in money, and in case of assignment the title to the third of the wheat would, upon its being set apart, vest at once in the assignee, precisely as it would vest in the assignor if no assignment were made." These rules are nowhere disputed, and they constitute the reasoning for the conclusion. The opinion leaves to inference what the interest was to be mortgaged before the title or ownership passed. The case as clearly holds that the money to be paid as rent could as well be mortgaged as the grain, for the conclusion seems to rest on the right to assign the chose in action. The opinion is, in its reasoning, in accord with general authority to the effect that the landlord has no ownership of growing crops before there is a separation. The case of Hammock v. Creekmore, 48 Ark. 264, is cited by the majority. The case expressly holds that the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist, and the rule of the case is undoubtedly correct. However, the majority have omitted to notice this conclusive language of the case against their theory of the law: "If the terms of the contract had been such as to indicate the intention to create the relationship of landlord and tenant, . . . the title to the crop would have been in Stewart, the tenant, subject to the landlord's lien for rent, and the landlord could have maintained no action against Creekmore for converting any part of it. The case holds that Stewart was a laborer for wages, and not a tenant, and it fully supports the holdings in this state as to there being no ownership of the crop in the landlord. It fixes his right in the crop before separation as that of a lien for rent, as I maintain this court has done. The case fully supports my view in this: that the landlord was to furnish the team, utensils, etc., to raise the crop, and Stewart was to do the work, and receive a share of the crop for his labor. Stewart sold a part of the crop, and the holding is that the title to the crop was in the land owner, and Stewart could not sell a part of it. The case places Stewart, under his contract to take a share of the crops for his wages, precisely as that case does, and other cases do, the land owner when he agrees to take a share of the crop for his rent. In one case the rent is to be paid by the tenant, and in the other the wages by the land owner. In either case it is a debt. The person who is to pay owns the money or property with which the debt is to be paid until payment. The mere fact that a debt is payable in a specific article, either of money or of other property, does not invest the creditor with ownership in the specific property until his contract gives him the right to demand payment, if even then. I am not disposed to pursue the discussion further. I am confident of the conclusion that our holdings are conclusive against the rule announced by the majority, and these holdings are aided by the great weight of authority. It is said, in substance, in the majority opinion, that the attachment by garnishment did not effect a lien on the grain before it was set apart, and that when so set apart, if not before, the lien of the mortgage attached, and gave it priority. I am understanding this to mean, as a legal proposition, that if A is attached as garnishee in a suit by B against C, and he has property belonging to C in his possession, C may afterwards mortgage it, and the mortgage would be a prior lien. I am much disposed to doubt the rule, but desire to reserve my opinion on that question and that stated in the concurring opinion. In view of the conclusion of the majority the case must stand affirmed, and I need not now take time to examine the latter question.

Rothrock, Ch. J., concurs in this dissent.

Mr. T. Henry Dewey for the other defendants.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us for our advice on a reservation upon an agreed statement of facts, and with a stipulation, entered into by all the parties to the record, that all questions arising upon the pleadings or upon the agreed facts may be finally determined by this court.

On January 8, 1872, the stockholders of the Delaney & Munson Manufacturing Company, located at Farmington, Conn., executed and delivered to the National Exchange Bank of Hartford a contract of continuing guaranty in the form of a bond, the terms of which appear at length in the opinion of this court in the case of National Exch. Bank v. Gay, 57 Conn. 224, 231, 4 L. R. A. 343, brought against one of the guarantors upon the bond. This bond guaranteed to the bank "the full, prompt, and ultimate payment" of all commercial paper which the bank may "have discounted or may hereafter discount, . . . to an amount not to exceed $15,000 in all at any one time." It provided that, upon notice to the bank by one or all of the guarantors upon such instrument, such guarantor or guarantors should not be holden upon said bond for any liability created by such company subsequent to the giving of such notice. From the date of the bond, to February 9, 1888, the bank discounted commercial paper of said company, upon which date the company failed. On January 21, 1889, the bank recovered judgment against the executors of Gay, one of the guarantors upon the bond, for the sum of over $11,000, which sum, together with the expenses of the suit, the executors paid. Subsequently, Wadsworth, another guarantor upon the bond, voluntarily paid to the executors of Gay one half of said amounts. The present action is brought by the executors of Gay and of Wadsworth, against the administratrix of Augustus Ward, a guarantor upon the bond; William Potts, administrator upon the estate of Samuel S. Cowles, a guarantor upon the bond; Horace Cowles, a son of said Samuel S. Cowles; and Mary C. Hardy, a purchaser from a distributee of the estate of Horace Cowles. Said Ward died April 6, 1883. His estate was duly settled, and distribution made December 8, 1883. Said Samuel S. Cowles died in 1873. His estate was duly settled and distribution made June 7, 1873; a part being distributed to his son, Horace Cowles, who died in 1876. His estate was duly settled and distribution made September 25, 1876. A part of the estate inherited by Horace Cowles from his father, Samuel S. Cowles, was purchased by Mary C. Hardy from a distributee of the estate of Horace Cowles, and owned by her when she was made a party to this action. All of the discounts existing February 9, 1888, which the estate of Gay and Wadsworth paid, were made by the bank long subsequent to the death of Samuel S. Cowles, and none were renewals of discounts made in his lifetime. $5,000 of said $11,000 were discounts made by the bank after having notice of Ward's death, and $6,000 of said $11,000 were renewals of paper made after notice of Ward's death, but of paper originally discounted prior to Ward's death. The bank, Gay, and Wadsworth had immediate notice of the death of said Samuel S. Cowles and of Ward. The said manufacturing company was solvent at the time of the death of said Samuel S. Cowles and of Ward.

The stockholders of the Delaney & Munson Manufacturing Company, by pledging their individual credit to the National Exchange Bank, secured funds, through discounts made by the bank, with which to conduct its business. "To avoid the inconvenience of indorsements by several individuals upon each of a large number of original notes and the renewals thereof, the obligors made one comprehensive continuing contract of indorsement in the form of a guaranty under their respective hands and seals." National Exch. Bank v. Gay, supra. The bond constituted a contract of continuing guaranty, upon the part of its obligors or guarantors, of payment of all paper discounted by the bank up to the limit of the amount named in the bond. No consideration passed at the execution of the bond. Each discount, when made upon the credit of the guaranty, constituted a consideration, separable and divisible. No obligation arose and no liability was created until a discount was made upon the credit of the guaranty. The bond was framed to meet the contingency of the long continuation of discounts by the bank, and the extension and renewal of discounts made upon the security of its guaranty. Upon the nature of this guaranty this court expressed itself, in the case we quoted from above, as follows: "To guarantee 'full and prompt' payment would meet the case of a note, on usual bank time, actually to be paid in full at maturity. To guarantee, in addition to 'full and prompt' payment, the 'ultimate' payment, can have no other meaning than that the obligor should continue bound to the end of all substitutions, renewals, and extensions."

The bank was under no compulsion to discount the company's paper. It might, at its option, refuse to continue discounting it. When it made the discounts, the guaranty of the bond attached. Each guarantor upon the bond might, upon notice in writing to the bank, terminate all liability thereafter arising under the bond. Unless the terms of the guaranty forbid, the law writes in the contract of continuing guaranty a like power to revoke the guaranty upon notice. Coulthart v. Clementson, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 42; Jordan v. Dobbins, 122 Mass. 168, 23 Am. Rep. 305; Agawam Bank v. Strever, 18 N. Y. 502. The effect of the death of a guarantor upon a continuing guaranty has been determined differently in different jurisdictions. In Massachusetts, death is held to work a revocation of the guaranty. The court, in construing a continuing guaranty of the sale of goods, in the case of Jordan v. Dobbins, supra, said: "Death terminates the power of the deceased to act, and revokes any authority or license he may have given, if it has not been executed or acted upon. His estate is held upon any contract upon which a liability exists at the time of his death, although it may depend upon future contingencies. But it is not held for a liability which is created after his death, by the exercise of a power or authority which he might at any time revoke. See also Hyland v. Habich, 150 Mass. 112, 6 L. R. A. 382. In England, death does not work a revocation of the continuing guaranty. The case of Coulthart v. Clementson supra, was an action brought by a bank upon a continuing guaranty against the executor of a deceased guarantor. The court said: "A guaranty like the present is not a mere mandate or authority revoked ipso facto by the death of the guarantor." These two cases illustrate the two views held by courts of different jurisdictions. We prefer to adopt the latter view. To adopt the Massachusetts doctrine would impose upon the guarantee the burden of knowing at all times whether or not the guarantors are in life. There could be no safety in relying upon the credit of the guarantor, unless at the moment of reliance the guarantee knew the guarantor to be in life. The practical difficulties in the way of a guaranty so construed would prevent credit being given upon it, and curtail a useful method of commercial business. Further, a guaranty of this nature is intended to continue until revoked by act of the parties or its equivalent. But, when the guarantee has knowledge of the death of the guarantor, such knowledge works a revocation of the guaranty. The guarantee no longer relies upon the credit of the deceased guarantor. Each advance made by the guarantee constitutes a fresh consideration, and, when made, an irrevocable promise or guaranty on the part of the living guarantors. Each advance thereafter made is upon the credit of the living, not of the dead, guarantor. Were this not so,—unless it be held that the representatives of the deceased may upon notice terminate the guaranty,—the guaranty, terminable at the option of the guarantor during life, becomes, upon his death, never ending. The limitation which the law gives the living is denied the dead. Estates must remain unsettled, devises of property be withheld, so long as the guaranty may last, and the representatives of the deceased guarantor be powerless to save his estate from a loss which neither he nor they authorized or received benefit for. Such a result justifies and impels a court in reading into the guaranty a limitation of termination of the guaranty, upon notice of the death of the guarantor, as well as upon notice from the living guarantor. Any notice of death which brings that fact within the knowledge of the guarantee is a proper and sufficient notice. In the case of Coulthart v. Clementson, supra, the court said: "It is now established by authority that such continuing guaranties can be withdrawn on notice during the lifetime of the guarantor, and a limitation to that effect must be read, so to speak, into the contract. But what is to happen on his death? Is the guaranty irrevocable and to go on forever? It would be absurd to refuse to read into the lines of the contract, in order to protect the dead man's estate, a limitation which is read into it to protect him while he is alive. . . . But if the executor has no option of the sort, then, in my opinion, the notice of the death of the testator, and of the existence of a will, is constructive notice of the determination as to future advances of the guarantee. The bank from that moment are aware that the person who could during his lifetime have discontinued the guaranty by notice cannot any longer be a giver of notices; that his estate has passed to others, who have trusts to fulfil, and it is easy for them to ascertain what those trusts are. If these trusts do not enable the executor to continue the guaranty, then the bank has constructive notice that the guaranty is withdrawn." National Eagle Bank v. Hunt, 16 R. I. 148; Harriss v. Fawcett, L. R. 15 Eq. 311. The authorities uniformly hold either that death, ipso facto, or notice of death, revokes a continuing guaranty. The fact that the instrument is under seal cannot change its nature or construction. Jordan v. Dobbins, 122 Mass. 168, 23 Am. Rep. 305; Offord v. Davies, 12 C. B. N. S. 748. A similar doctrine holds that notice of the dissolution of a copartnership revokes a continuing guaranty made by the copartnership. City Nat. Bank v. Phelps, 86 N. Y. 484.

The application of these principles to the case in hand is this: All of the discounts for which recovery was had against Gay's estate, and payment made by Gay's executors and Wadsworth, were made after notice of the death of Samuel S. Cowles. His representatives are therefore freed from all liability for such discounts. Liability, if any, for discounts so made upon the credit of the guaranty, could only accrue against the estate of Samuel S. Cowles, and could in no view of the case be maintained against the estate of Horace Cowles or Mary Hardy. Five thousand dollars of the said discounts were made after notice of the death of Augustus Ward. His representatives are therefore freed from all liability for such discounts. The remaining discounts ($6 000) were originally made before the death of Augustus Ward. His death, with notice, did not relieve his estate from liability for such discounts. For all discounts made prior to his death, whether original discounts or renewals or extensions thereof, his estate is liable upon his death. The duty of the bank upon this bond, if it desired to hold the estate of Ward liable, was to enforce its claim upon the paper existent at Ward's death, against his estate. Instead of this, the bank renewed and extended its discounts taking new paper for the old, without the knowledge or acquiescence of the representatives of Ward. Thereafter the bank must look to the remaining guarantors upon the bond. It waived its right to enforce payment from the estate of Ward when it accepted paper in renewal of the old. Each renewal of the old paper constituted payment of the old paper, so far as Ward's estate was concerned. Each renewal so made had, for its security, the guaranty of the living guarantors upon the bond, who had not notified the bank of the termination of their liability upon the guaranty.

The conclusion arrived at is just to the bank, for it can cease, upon notice of the death of a guarantor, to renew paper then discounted, and can enforce its payment against the estate of the deceased guarantor. It is just to the remaining guarantors, who can, upon notice of the death of a guarantor, terminate their liability, and, if compelled to pay that liability, by appropriate remedy compel the estate of the deceased guarantor to contribute his proportion to the liability incurred. For all liability arising before notice of the death of the guarantor, the remaining guarantors can provide by the terms of the guaranty. In the case at hand, all the guarantors upon this bond had notice of the death of both Samuel S. Cowles and Augustus Ward, and made no attempt to terminate their liability upon the bond, and no effort to compel the estate of either to help meet the liability existing, but thereafter, without the knowledge, consent, or acquiescence of the representatives of Cowles or Ward, renewed the old paper through a long series of years, and increased their own liability by fresh discounts. A renewal of paper made before the death of a guarantor, upon the credit of a bond guaranteeing payment of such paper, made after notice of said death to the guarantee, terminates the liability of such guarantor after said notice. The precise question at issue was determined in accordance with the conclusions we reach, in the case of National Eagle Bank v. Hunt, 16 R. I. 148, 153. In its opinion, the court said: "The guarantees in the case at bar come within the second class above considered. They were therefore, upon the authorities cited, terminated by the death of the guarantor, and notice of it to the plaintiff, as to all subsequent transactions. As, however, the note described in the declaration had been discounted, and the net proceeds had been paid to the maker prior to the death of the guarantor, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover but for the fact, set up in the pleas, that, after notice of the death of the guarantor, it extended the time of payment for a further period, by taking a new note from the principal debtor, and receiving the interest thereon in advance, without the consent of the defendant, and without any reservation of his right, assented to by the principal, to insist upon immediate payment by the principal, and, in default of such payment, to pay the debt himself, and proceed at once against the principal. That such action on the part of the plaintiff was sufficient to release the estate of the guarantor, and the defendant, as his representative, from liability, is too well established to need the citation of authority."

The question whether a guaranty will be revoked by notice of death, when, by the terms of the guaranty, the guarantor could not in life have revoked the guaranty, is not before us, and we express no opinion upon this point.

The claim that, because the bond of guaranty in this case bound the guarantors to the "full, prompt, and ultimate payment" of all paper discounted after the execution of such bond, therefore the guaranty covers discounts made before the death, and the renewals of such discounts made after the death of the guarantor, cannot be sustained. The guaranty here applies to paper discounted, and to the renewal or extension of such discounts, before the decease of a guarantor; otherwise, a continuing liability existed against the estate of the deceased guarantor so long as the renewals were made. Such a result was not intended by the parties to the bond. They did not intend to continue a liability after the death of a guarantor, for an indefinite period, which he and they could terminate at any time during his life. A contract of guaranty is to be construed so as to promote the use and convenience of commercial intercourse. Davis v. Wells, F. & Co. 104 U. S. 159, 169, 26 L. ed. 686, 690. And its language is not to be extended by any strained construction, for the purpose of enlarging the guarantor's liability (Hall v. Rand, 8 Conn. 560, 573); but its construction is to be according to what is fairly to be presumed to have been the understanding of the parties, without any strict technical nicety (Lee v. Dick, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 482, 493, 9 L. ed. 503, 507; Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273, 281, 45 Am. Rep. 204). These established rules of construction accord with the construction we give to the guaranty before us.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss other questions argued before us, since the questions considered are decisive of the case. We have not overlooked the fact that there has been a misjoinder of parties defendant. The estate of Horace Cowles and Mary Hardy were strangers to the guaranty. The representatives of Samuel S. Cowles are alone liable upon his obligations. There is, as well, a misjoinder of parties plaintiff. Mr. Wadsworth voluntarily paid one half of the amount recovered against the estate of Gay. He cannot now maintain, with Gay's representatives, an action to compel payment to them of the share of other guarantors paid by him for them.

The Superior Court is advised to render judgment in favor of the defendants.

v.
Theodore A. TUTTLE, Tax Collector.

(67 Conn. 162.)

1. An assessment for benefits for a local public improvement is in its nature a tax.

2. A sewer assessment carries no interest as such nor by way of penalty for nonpayment unless the law so provides.

3. A municipal by-law cannot require interest on sewer assessments unless the power is conferred upon the city to make such by-law.

CASE reserved by the Superior Court for New Haven County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors in a proceeding to have certain alleged tax liens on plaintiff's property adjudged to be invalid. Judgment for plaintiff advised.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Kimberly Beach, for plaintiff:

Interest does not run in general upon taxes and assessments.

Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. L. 398; Shaw v. Peckett, 26 Vt. 482; Belvidere v. Warren R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 193; State, Brennert, v. Farrier, 47 N. J. S. 513, 26 L. ed. 204.

There is no element of contract or agreement from which a promise to pay interest on taxes can be implied.

Whatever interest was demanded by the state must be regarded as in the nature of a penalty, and the statutes providing for interest upon unpaid taxes must not be extended by implication or construction beyond their strict meaning.

The charter and by laws of the city of New Haven do not provide for the exaction of interest on assessments appealed during the pendency of the appeal.

An assessment is a tax.

Messrs. Case, Ely, & Case, for defendant:

The laying of this assessment is not a tax in the usual acceptance of the term, but is an assessment for a local and special benefit to private property, while a tax is an assessment for a public or general use in which the payee has no direct or immediate interest.

The city is not at fault. It performed all of its duties and has paid money which plaintiff should have paid, and the city, unless it can collect the interest, will have to pay a bonus for discharging a duty from which it has derived no benefit.

The assessment was legally made after a full hearing by the proper tribunal and should have the same effect and be governed by the rules governing judgments so far as interest is concerned.

Strusburgh v. New York, 13 Jones & S. 508.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under § 3040 of the General Statutes, to have certain liens upon real estate adjudged invalid. The case comes to this court by reservation upon a statement of facts, of which the following is the substance: Prior to December 13, 1873, four assessments of benefits, amounting in all to nearly $2,000, were laid, under the charter of the city of New Haven, against certain real estate of the plaintiff in said city, on account of the construction of a public sewer. These assessments were legally laid, and would, if unappealed from, have become payable on December 13, 1873; but prior to that day the plaintiff, under the charter, took an appeal from said assessments to the superior court. On February 11, 1874, and while said appeal was pending, four certificates of lien, on account of said assessments against said real estate, were filed in the town clerk's office in New Haven for the purpose of continuing the liens upon said real estate, under § 37 of the then city charter. Said appeal was finally determined in the superior court on the 29th of November, 1892, and the assessments in question were by that tribunal confirmed, with costs against the present plaintiff. Afterwards, in March, 1893, the plaintiff paid to the proper officer of said city the amount of the four assessments, with interest only from November 29, 1892, which amount was tendered and received without prejudice to the rights of either party. On receipt of this money the defendant discharged two of the liens, but refused, and still refuses, to discharge the other two. This refusal was and is based on the claim that the assessments in question carried interest, either from December 13, 1873, or at least from the time the certificates of lien were filed in 1874. If this claim is correct, the defendant is justified in his refusal to discharge the liens. On the other hand, the plaintiff claims that interest was due only from the date of the final determination of the appeal in the superior court in 1892; and, if this claim is correct, it is found that the plaintiff "tendered to the tax collector all that was due on said assessments on March 23, 1893." If then, the plaintiff's claim is correct, judgment must be advised for it; otherwise for the defendant.

Passing the first point made in the plaintiff's brief, his claim is based upon three propositions: First, that these assessments were really taxes; second, that, as taxes, interest as such, or by way of penalty upon them, cannot be collected, unless the power to do so is conferred by law; and, third, that no such power was so conferred upon anyone with reference to the assessments in question. If these propositions are true,—and we think they are,—the plaintiff's claim must be sustained.

That assessments, like those in question here, upon specific property specially benefited by a local public improvement, for the purpose of paying the expense of that improvement, are taxes, is too well settled to require extended argument. Such assessments are enforced proportional contributions of a somewhat special kind, made in invitum, by virtue of legislative authority conferred upon the municipality for that purpose, upon such terms and conditions as the legislature, within constitutional limits, sees fit to impose. The power thus conferred is essentially a power to tax; its exercise in the manner prescribed is a mode of taxation; and the sums raised by such exercise are taxes, and are always treated as such. Such assessments are not liable to set off, nor attachment, as debts; and they can be collected summarily by the tax collector, in like manner as ordinary taxes, if the legislature sees fit to authorize such method, without the aid of courts, and without the delay incident thereto. Assessments of benefits caused by the layout or alteration of highways may, by statute, "be collected in the same manner as town taxes are collected." Gen. Stat. § 2705. And the assessments of benefits under the charter of New Haven, like those in question, were treated by the legislature as taxes, and were made collectible by the tax collector in the same manner as any other tax. Charter of 1869, § 50. It is true, provision is also made in the charter for collecting such assessments by proceedings in the nature of a foreclosure of a tax lien; but this does not alter the nature of the sum to be collected. The proceeding by way of foreclosure was, in effect, only another method which the tax collector was authorized to employ to collect the tax. But the decision of this court in Nichols v. Bridgeport, 23 Conn. 189, 60 Am. Dec. 636, approved in Bridgeport v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 36 Conn. 255, 4 Am. Rep. 63, is so conclusive upon this first point in favor of the plaintiff as to render unnecessary further argument or citation of authority.

The second proposition, to the effect that a tax carries no interest, as such, nor by way of penalty for nonpayment, unless the law so provides, is, we also think, a correct statement of the law. Most of the cases in which interest may be recovered, under our law, in the absence of any statute regulating the matter, are enumerated in Selleck v. French, 1 Conn. 32, 6 Am. Dec. 185; and clearly assessments of this kind do not come within any of the classes of cases there enumerated. It will, we think, also be found true that whenever taxes have carried interest, either as such, or by way of penalty, it has been by virtue of some statutory provision to that effect. And this is as it should be. At best, a tax is a burden—a necessary one, it is true, but none the less a burden—imposed on the taxpayer without reference to his consent; and it seems reasonable to hold that any increase of that burden, by way of penalty or otherwise, should be expressly made by the power which imposes it, and that, until the legislative will to increase the burden by the addition of interest has been clearly expressed, interest should not be allowed. This conclusion, which on principle seems reasonable, is supported more or less strongly by the following authorities: Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. L. 398; Belvidere v. Warren R. Co.

34 N. J. L. 193; Brennert v. Farrier, 47 N. J. L. 75; Danforth v. Williams, 9 Mass. 324; Shaw v. Peckett, 26 Vt. 482; Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 318; People v. Gold & Stock Teleg. Co. 98 N. Y. 67; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 55 Tex. 314; Cooley, Taxn. 300, note 4.

We think the above rule, thus applied in the case of taxes as ordinarily laid, is applicable to the kind of taxes here in question; and that unless some public statute, or the city charter, expressly or by clear implication, authorized the collection of interest, as claimed by the defendant, upon the assessments in question, it was not collectible. The remaining question, then, is whether such authority was conferred upon anyone, either by some public statute, or by the city charter. At the time these assessments were made, in 1873, and ever since, interest was and has been collectible on overdue ordinary taxes in New Haven under the provisions contained in title 64, chap. 2, of the General Statutes of 1866, which are still in force in that city. See Gen. Stat. 1875, p. 552; Charter of 1869, § 50; Charter of 1881, § 14; and Charter of 1890, § 14. But it is not claimed, nor can it reasonably be claimed, that the aforesaid provisions are applicable to the assessments here in question, for those provisions clearly relate solely and only to ordinary taxes laid in the ordinary way by the city or town of New Haven, or school districts therein; and, although we hold an assessment of benefits to be a tax, it is clearly not a tax, of the kind specified in those provisions. Section 2704 of the General Statutes of 1888 provides that when assessments of benefits shall be laid by any municipality upon property specially benefited by any public work or improvement, and a certificate of lien therefor has been filed, "neither the principal of such assessment nor any interest thereon shall be collectible by such municipality" until the work is completed, and the fact of such completion duly recorded. It may be said that this statute recognizes, by implication at least, the right to collect interest upon such assessments where a lien has been filed; and, with proper limitations, this may be conceded, for we think it does recognize such right, but only in cases where the right already exists. It does not create, nor was it intended to create, such right. That statute was passed in 1883, ten years after these assessments were made, and its plain and obvious purpose was, not to confer power to collect interest on such assessments where it did not already exist, but to prevent municipalities from collecting any part of the assessed benefits until such benefits had been conferred by the completion of the public work. We have failed to find any other public statute relating to this matter, and perhaps we ought to say that counsel for defendant did not claim that there was any such public statute, but rested his contention solely upon the provisions of the city charter. After a somewhat careful examination of the charter of 1869 (the one in force in 1873), and of the charters of 1881 and 1890, we can find no power conferred, either expressly or by fair implication, to collect the interest here claimed by the defendant. In short, we know of no statute, public or private, which conferred this power with reference to these assessments. It is true that a by-law of the city existing in 1873, and in substantially the same form ever since, provides for the payment of interest upon liens of this kind from the date of the certificate of lien; but no provision in the charter has been found, or pointed out to us, which gave the common council power to make a by-law exacting interest in such a case, and in the absence of such provision the by-law can, in this respect, have no force; and, indeed, upon the argument, counsel for the defendant made no claim under the by-law. For the reasons given, we think the defendant was not entitled to interest upon these assessments for the period between the dates of the certificates of lien and November 29, 1892, and that the claim of the plaintiff upon this point must be sustained.

The plaintiff also claimed that, even assuming that interest was collectible by law upon assessments unappealed from after they become payable under the provisions of the charter and by-laws of the city, the appealed assessments here in question did not, under those provisions, become due and payable till November 29, 1892. In the view already taken of this case, we deem it unnecessary to consider or decide the questions involved in this claim.

The Superior Court is advised to render judgment for the plaintiff.

The other Judges concur.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

MISSOURI, KANSAS, & TEXAS RAILWAY COMPANY OF TEXAS, Plff. in Err., Mollie EDWARDS, by Next Friend.

(.....Tex.....)

Injury to a child while playing on a pile of railroad bridge ties in the railroad yard, which is fenced except on the side along the railroad track, and out of which the servants of the company always ordered any children found there, does not render the railroad company liable, as it was not under obligation to so pile the ties as to prevent injury by a child climbing upon them.

(June 25, 1896.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Grayson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. C. Foster and A. E. Wilkinson, for plaintiff in error:

Defendant was under no obligation to keep watch over its premises in order to exclude children therefrom. If the watchman of defendant discovered plaintiff with others playing in the yard shortly before the accident, and requested them to leave, and plaintiff thereupon withdrew from the premises but thereafter returned without the knowledge of defendant's watchman or person in charge of its property, for the purpose of playing in the yard, and, while doing so, was injured, without such watchman having knowledge of her being then present, and while playing there pulled down upon herself, or caused to fall, a tie or portion of a pile of ties upon which she was climbing,—defendant would not be liable to plaintiff by reason of any injury so received.

Gaines, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mollie Edwards, a minor suing by her next friend, brought this action against the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company of Texas to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant company. The negligence was alleged to consist in keeping a yard in which children were accustomed to play, and in piling a number of railroad bridge ties in such manner that they fell upon the plaintiff while playing upon them, and injured her. The facts disclosed by the testimony are as follows: The defendant company owned a lumber yard, which was used for the purpose of storing bridge material and other like lumber. It was fenced, except upon one side, along the company's railroad tracks. The plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was about eight years old, and lived, with her mother, just across an alley from the yard. Not being fenced along the track, the yard was easily accessible. It was shown that the plaintiff and other children were accustomed to resort there for the purpose of playing, but it was also shown that they were uniformly ordered out by the servants of the company. The parents of some of them were also warned to keep them away. It appeared, however, that, notwithstanding the persistent efforts of the servants of the company, the children would return. Just before the accident happened, the plaintiff was sent home by the watchman, and went out; but as soon as he was called away by other duties she returned. In attempting to climb upon the pile of bridge ties one of them fell down, and crushed her toes. There was evidence tending to show that the ties were insecurely stacked. The mother of the plaintiff testified in effect that she knew of the plaintiff's having visited the yard on former occasions and had punished her several times for it. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in the trial court, which judgment was affirmed in the court of civil appeals. 32 S. W. 815. The case comes to this court upon a petition for a writ of error, which has been granted.

The errors assigned in the court of civil appeals, and which are insisted upon in this court, are upon the charge of the court and upon the refusal to give certain special instructions requested in behalf of the defendant. But in the view we take of the case no critical examination of the charges is necessary. Two of the requested instructions were, in our opinion, statements of the law of the case, as applied to the facts in evidence, and should have been given. They were as follows: (1) "Defendant was under no obligation to keep watch over its premises in order to exclude children therefrom. If the watchman of defendant discovered plaintiff, with others, playing in the yard, shortly before the accident, and requested them to leave, and plaintiff thereupon withdrew from the premises, but thereafter returned, without the knowledge of defendant's watchman or person in charge of its property, for the purpose of playing in the yard, and while so doing was injured, without such watchman having knowledge of her being then present, and while playing there pulled down upon herself or caused to fall a tie or portion of a pile of ties upon which she was climbing, defendant would not be liable to plaintiff by reason of any injury so received." (2) "Defendant was under no obligation to plaintiff to keep its lumber yard in safe or proper condition for plaintiff to play thereon. The yards were its property, and it was entitled, as to plaintiff, to use them for piling lumber, and to pile the same in such form as it found convenient, with due regard to the safety of such persons only as might properly use the yards. It was under no obligations to so pile or place its bridge ties as to prevent injury by a child climbing upon them, or to so pile, fasten, or brace the same that the child could not, in trying to climb thereon, pull one or more of them down upon herself; nor can it be held negligent for failing to so pile, brace, or secure them, if the injured person was at the time thereon without its knowledge or invitation." Ordinarily, the owner of property is not bound to keep it in such condition as to protect trespassers upon it from danger. Liability may be incurred by making an excavation upon one's own land sufficiently near a street or highway that another may, in the exercise of reasonable care, fall into it, or by exposing dangerous machinery or appliances in or near some public place, whereby one without fault on his part may be injured. Especially in the latter case may liability be incurred when children are the victims. Until they have learned some discretion, they cannot be held guilty of contributory negligence. Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, is a case of this class. There the "defendant negligently left his horse and cart unattended in the street. Plaintiff, a child seven years old, got upon the cart in play; another child incautiously led the horse on; and plaintiff was thereby thrown down and hurt." It was held that the plaintiff could recover. There are numerous American decisions which proceed upon the same principle. With reference to children, there is still another class of cases which go a step further, and hold that the owner of land may not place upon it dangerous machinery which is alluring to children, without securing it so as to protect them against injury while tampering with it. To this class belong what have become commonly known in legal parlance as "The Turntable Cases;" such as Evansich v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (in this court), 57 Tex. 123, 44 Am. Rep. 586, and Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout (in the Supreme Court of the United States), 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. This line of decision has not been uniformly followed, and has met with much adverse criticism, and it seems to us that with respect to the care which the owner of land is required to exercise in order to secure from injury children who may trespass upon it they go to the limit of the law. They proceed upon the ground that turntables are attractive to children. In both of the cases cited stress was laid upon this fact, and also upon the fact that the use of the turntables by children was known to the servants of the defendants. The ruling in these cases must be justified, we think, upon one of two grounds: either that the turntables possess such peculiar attractiveness as playthings for children that to leave them exposed should be deemed equivalent to an invitation to use them, or that, when unsecured, they are so obviously dangerous to children that, when it is discovered that they are using them, it is negligent on part of the owner not to take some steps to guard them against the danger. But when it is said that it is enough that the object or place is attractive or alluring to children, and when it is said, as has been intimated, that the fact that they resort to a particular locality is evidence of its attractiveness, the question suggests itself, what object or place is not attractive to very young persons who are left free to pursue their innate propensity to wander in quest of amusement? What object at all unusual is exempt from infantile curiosity? What place, conveniently accessible for their congregation, is free from the restless feet of adventurous truants? Here the language of an eminent judge in disposing of a similar case is appropriate: "There are streams and pools of water where children may be drowned; there are inequalities of surface where they may be injured. To compel the owners of such property either to inclose it or fill up their ponds and level the surface so that trespassers may not be injured would be an oppressive rule. The law does not require us to enforce any such principle even where the trespassers are children. We all know that boys of eight years of age indulge in athletic sports. They fish, shoot, swim, and climb trees. All of these amusements are attended with danger, and accidents frequently occur. It is part of a boy's nature to trespass, especially where there is tempting fruit, yet I never heard that it was the duty of the owner of a fruit tree to cut it down because a boy trespasser may possibly fall from its branches. Yet the principle contended for by the plaintiff would bring us to this absurdity if carried to its logical conclusion. Moreover, it would charge the duty of the protection of children upon every member of the community except their parents." Paxson, J., in Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365. We do not see that a yard kept by a railroad company for the deposit of old ties and other rejected material, or new material for railroad repair and construction, possesses any greater attraction for children than any other place of deposit of any similar material kept by people pursuing other avocations. Is a pile of ties any more alluring than a pile of wood kept for fuel, or a pile of rails laid aside for making or repairing a farm fence? Children may injure themselves in playing upon either. In such a case we conclude that the law does not devolve the duty upon the owner of the yard to see that the ties are so placed that children may not injure themselves while playing upon them. It has been so held in effect in many cases. See Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467; McAlpin v. Powell, 55 How. Pr. 163; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cunningham, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 65; Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Crum, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 702. We refer especially to the able and elaborate opinion of Mr. Justice Sherwood in Barney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 126 Mo. 372, 26 L. R. A. 847, which contains a thorough discussion of the cases bearing on the question.

Applying the principles announced to the facts of this case, we are of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. There was no peculiar allurement about the yard of the defendant company. Though the ties may have been inartistically piled, we do not see that any danger should have been anticipated from the manner in which they were stored. A witness swore that children seemed fond of playing about the lumber. If anyone ever tampered with the ties before, it does not appear from the testimony. The defendant could not, consistently with the use of its yard, fence it along its track. Children were persistently ordered out of the yard, and there is no ground for claiming an implied or constructive invitation to come upon the yard. In any possible aspect of the case the charge which was given by the court was erroneous in authorizing the jury to find for the plaintiff, without reference to the question whether the servants of the company had exercised ordinary care to keep children out of its yard. If, in the opinion of the jury, such care had been exercised, then the verdict should have been for the defendant. But the court should have gone further, and given the requested instructions which have been quoted above, and this is equivalent to saying that it should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

The judgments of the District Court and of the Court of Civil Appeals are reversed, and the cause remanded.

An appeal from a judgment or order which the district court entered in exact accordance with the mandate of this court upon a previous appeal will be dismissed upon motion of the appellee.

(January 30, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for the Third District in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the wrongful acts of defendant's servants. Appeal dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs Bennett, Marshall, & Bradley for appellant.

Messrs. C. S. Varian and E. W. Taylor, for respondent:

Under no circumstances, in no event, can an appeal like this lie. It is purely a false and fictitious appeal. The case is simply an attempt to prolong wearisome discussion by appealing to this court from its own decision.

An appeal from the decision of the court below in accordance with the mandate of the appellate court cannot be maintained.

Bartch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the court below to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the wrongful acts of the servants of the defendant company. The complaint contained two counts, and at the trial the court directed a verdict to be given for the defendant on the first count; and the cause having been submitted to the jury on the second count, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff. The defendant thereupon moved the court for a new trial on the second cause of action, which motion was granted. The plaintiff then appealed from the action of the court directing a verdict for the defendant on the first count, and also from the order granting a new trial on the second, and the appellate court affirmed the action of the lower court on the first, and reversed its order granting a new trial on the second count, and ordered the original judgment to be reinstated. In pursuance of the mandate of the appellate court, said judgment was reinstated, and from the judgment so entered, the defendant prosecuted this appeal, which is now being considered, on motion to dismiss, on the ground that it is substantially a second appeal on the same state of facts.

The only material question raised by this motion is whether, under the circumstances apparent from the record in this case, an appeal will lie from a judgment entered in pursuance of the mandate of the appellate court. Counsel for the appellant contend that this appeal is proper because the former one was simply from an order granting a new trial, and not from the judgment which was vacated by said order; that after the original judgment was reinstated, it was subject to appeal, to present questions which could not be raised on the appeal from the order granting a new trial; and that the defendant had no previous opportunity to appeal from the judgment. We think the position assumed by the appellant is not well taken. It had an opportunity to appeal from the judgment in the first instance, and all the matters of which it now complains could have been reviewed. Instead of that, it moved for a new trial, which was granted, and then the respondent herein appealed. That appeal brought up the entire record for examination, and with that record before it, the appellate court had power to consider, not only questions respecting the rulings of the court, made in the course of the trial, but also to consider the question, whether or not the verdict was excessive. Utah, Comp. Laws 1888, § 3400. While it is true, as a general rule, that questions respecting the sufficiency of the complaint cannot be considered by the court on motion for a new trial, nor on an appeal from an order granting a new trial, because such questions are not comprehended in the statutory ground for such motion (Utah, Comp. Laws 1888, supra; Jacks v. Buell, 47 Cal. 162; Mason v. Austin, 46 Cal. 385), still, if the appellant herein seriously doubted the sufficiency of the complaint, it could have been tested, and all the points now insisted upon could have been considered, by an appeal from the judgment, instead of a motion for a new trial. The attempt now to present them for review, on appeal from the judgment which was entered in pursuance of the mandate of the appellate court, must fail, because it is, in effect, an appeal from our own judgment. In deciding this case on the former appeal, this court said: "We are of the opinion from this record that the appellant is entitled to recover from the railroad company, and are not disposed, and do not find it necessary, to put him to the expense and trouble of a new trial. . . . The judgment upon the verdict as to the first count is affirmed, and the order granting a new trial as to the second count is reversed, and the original judgment upon the verdict reinstated as of April 28, 1894, the date of the original entry." This court had the right to direct the lower court to enter a proper judgment or order (Utah, Comp. Laws 1888, § 3006); and while the last sentence quoted is not strictly in the form of a direction, still we think it amounts to that, and it appears that the judgment was entered by the trial court precisely in accordance with our mandate. All the alleged errors now complained of occurred during the proceedings of the trial court before the motion for a new trial was heard, and there is no question made as to any errors having been committed in the proceedings subsequent to the mandate. Nor are we asked to review such proceedings. It is evident that this is an attempt to have another review of the rights of the parties, on the same record which was reviewed on the former appeal, when it was held that the plaintiff had the right to recover. Under such circumstances, an appeal from a judgment entered by an inferior court in pursuance of a mandate of the appellate court cannot be sustained; and this rule is not only in accordance with authority, but is founded on reason and justice, for, if successive appeals were allowed on the same state of the record, there would be no end to litigation and appeals, and the courts themselves could be turned into instruments of injustice by an obstinate litigant. In Stewart v. Salamon, 97 U. S. 361, 24 L. ed. 1044, where a decree had been entered by the circuit court in accordance with the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States, and an appeal taken therefrom, in dismissing the appeal the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Waite, said: "An appeal will not be entertained by this court from a decree entered in the circuit or other inferior court, in exact accordance with our mandate upon a previous appeal. Such a decree, when entered, is in effect our decree, and the appeal would be from ourselves to ourselves. If such an appeal is taken, however, we will, upon the application of the appellee, examine the decree entered, and if it conforms to the mandate, dismiss the case with costs. If it does not, the case will be remanded with appropriate directions for the correction of the error." Roberts v. Cooper, 61 U. S. 20 How. 467, 480, 15 L. ed. 969, 973; Humphrey v. Baker, 103 U. S. 736, 26 L. ed. 456; State v. Levelle, 38 S. (.....N. C.....)

*Headnote by BARTCH, J.

NOTE.—The above case is reported because it is entirely confined to a single question of practice which is not very frequently decided.

1. An agreement to refrain from editing or being connected with a newspaper or magazine in the county in which is published a newspaper the goodwill of which is transferred as a part of such agreement is not void as in restraint of trade.

2. The area in which a vendor can be restricted from competition with his vendee is as broad as is necessary to afford ample protection to the latter provided the agreement is not injurious to the public interest.

3. The temporary suspension of a newspaper while reasonably diligent efforts are made to find a suitable editor and continue

NOTE.—Constitutional freedom of speech and of the press.

I. In general.
II. Libels.
III. Prevention of speech or publication.

I. In general.

The constitutional right of free speech and free press is for the most part a perpetuation of the law of England on that subject; but inasmuch as it is in this country based on express provisions of the fundamental law, the construction of the language of the constitutions must determine the extent of the right.

Some limitation of the right of free speech and free press is conceded by all so far as respects liability to punishment for its abuse. But it is still uncertain whether or not the prevention instead of the punishment of unlawful speech or publication is constitutional. This matter of prevention is discussed in a later part of this note, division III.

Since the various constitutions nearly all provide expressly that persons exercising liberty of speech or of the press shall be responsible for an abuse of that liberty without specifying what shall constitute an abuse, it is plain that the intent was to leave the legality of any speech or publication to be determined by common-law principles and statutory declaration of the police power.

An ordinance prohibiting any public address upon any public grounds of a city, such as Boston common, is not an unconstitutional interference with free speech. Com. v. Davis, 162 Mass. 510, 26 L. R. A. 712.

A statute against blasphemy is held in Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 206, to be consistent with the declaration of rights, which declares that the liberty of the press ought not to be restrained.

the business will not defeat the right of the owner to enforce an agreement restricting competition by a former owner of the paper.

4. Fraud cannot be inferred from the fact of buying property through an agent who is instructed to take title in his own name and who does not disclose his agency.

5. The constitutional guaranty of the freedom of the press does not restrict the right of the owner of a newspaper on a sale of it to bind himself against editing or being connected with another journal in the same locality.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Durham County in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from conducting a newspaper in violation of his contract. Affirmed.

The original contract was made with John Wilber Jenkins. He assigned his interest to G. W. Watts, who assigned a half interest to B. N. Duke. The paper was then leased to plaintiff.

The contract was as follows:

For value received, $3,500, this day to us in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby fully acknowledged, we, Al. Fairbrother and Mrs. M. H. Fairbrother, have bargained and sold, and do by these presents, bargain, sell, transfer, assign, set over, deliver, and convey unto John Wilber Jenkins, absolutely free from all claims by us, the Durham Daily Globe and the Durham Weekly Globe, newspapers now published in said county and state; and also all type, printing presses, racks, imposing stones, subscription books and accounts thereon, except those which have already been earned and are now due; one iron safe (Cary), one caligraph, desks, tables, chairs, inks, paper, and all material on hand January 1, 1894; the subscription list of said newspapers and all office furniture and materials now used by us in conducting said newspapers, and all now contained in the office of said newspapers on the northwest corner of Main and Church streets, in the town of Durham; and the goodwill of said newspapers, and the business of conducting the same. And we

So, a statute prohibiting the use of profane language to the disturbance of the peace is not an interference with the constitutional right of free speech. State v. Warren, 113 N. C. 683.

The use of obscene language is not protected by the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of speech or of the press. United States v. Harmon, 45 Fed. Rep. 414, 13 Crim. L. Mag. 538; Harman v. United States, 50 Fed. Rep. 921; United States v. Bennett, 16 Blatchf. 338. This was decided in respect to the mailing of obscene publications in violation of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3893, making it a criminal offense to deposit such publications in the mails.

The exclusion from the mails of printed matter which the government deems injurious to the people, such as lottery circulars, is not in violation of the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of speech or of the press. The government does not thereby prohibit the circulation of such publications, but merely declines to become itself an agent in their circulation. Ex parte Rapier, 143 U. S. 110, 36 L. ed. 93; Horner v. United States, 143 U. S. 207, 36 L. ed. 126.

So, in Re Jackson, 96 U. S. 727, 24 L. ed. 877, it is said: "In excluding various articles from the mail, the object of Congress has not been to interfere with the freedom of the press, or with any other rights of the people, but to refuse its facilities for the distribution of matter deemed injurious to the public morals."

But a city ordinance declaring a certain newspaper called "The Sunday Sun" to be a public nuisance, and prohibiting its circulation within the city, is held to violate the section of the Bill of Rights which declares that "every person shall be at liberty to speak, write, or publish his opinions on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that privilege; and no law shall ever be passed curtailing the liberty of speech or of the press." Ex parte Neill, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 275. The court says: "The power to prohibit the publication of newspapers is not within the compass of legislative action, . . . and any law enacted for that purpose would clearly be in derogation of the Bill of Rights."

On the other hand, in answer to the contention that a statute providing for punishment for publishing a newspaper devoted largely to the publication of scandals and accounts of lecherous and immoral conduct was in violation of the constitutional right of all persons freely to "speak, write, or publish their sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of such right," the court says: "We entertain no doubt that the legislature has power to suppress this class of publications, without in any manner violating the constitutional liberties of the press." Re Banks, 56 Kan. 242.

These cases are not necessarily inconsistent, although the language used in them may seem so. In the Neill Case, it will be seen, the action taken was by a city council instead of the legislature,—was special, not general, and provided, not for the punishment of an obscene or immoral publication, if made, but for the exclusion from the city of a specified newspaper. In this Neill Case the court proceeds to say that the legislature has prescribed penalties for the abuse of liberty to publish, and adds: "We are not informed of any authority which sustains the doctrine that a municipal corporation is invested with the power to declare the sale of newspapers a nuisance. The power to suppress one concedes the power to suppress all, whether such publications are political, secular, religious, decent or indecent, obscene or otherwise. The doctrine of the Constitution must prevail in this state, which clothes the citizen with liberty to speak, write, or publish his opinion upon any and all subjects, subject alone to the responsibility for the abuse of such privilege."

The publication of any account of any illegal lottery, game, or device, stating when the same is to be drawn, or the prizes therein or in any of them, or the price of a ticket or share therein, or where any ticket may be obtained, or in any way aiding and assisting in the same, is held, in Hart v. People, 26 Hun, 396, to be within the constitutional power of the legislature to prohibit, especially as the Constitution itself declared that lotteries should not be authorized and that the legislature should pass laws to prevent the sale of lottery tickets. The court said: "An act of the legislature to prevent the press from discussing the legality or propriety of lotteries, or from exposing their existence as violations of law and calling the attention of the public authorities to them, or criticising the acts or neglect of public officials in regard to enforcing the laws against them, would be violations of the constitutional rights and liberties of the press. But it is a very different thing to prohibit the publication of accounts or notices or advertisements which are designed to aid and assist in the promotion of lotteries." The constitutional guaranty is of the right

Fairbrother shall not edit, print, or conduct a newspaper or magazine, nor be in any wise connected with one, anywhere in the county of Durham, said state, without the consent of said purchaser or his assigns. to speak, write, and publish "sentiments" and, while the court does not dwell on or even mention this distinction, it seems plain enough that the publication of newspaper advertisements or notices of a lottery drawing or of lottery tickets is not a publication of "sentiments" within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

A statute declaring that an itinerant vendor of drugs who shall by writing or printing or in any other method publicly profess to treat diseases shall pay a license fee and be guilty of a misdemeanor if he violates the statute is held not to infringe the constitutional right to speak, write, and publish sentiments on all subjects. State v. Blair (Iowa) 60 N. W. 486.

But a statute making it unlawful for a judge of any court, or superintendent of public instruction, or superintendent of schools, or certain other officers specified, to participate actively in politics by making political speeches or actively or officially participating in political meetings, is held, in Louthan v. Com. 79 Va. 196, 52 Am. Rep. 626, to be in conflict with the constitutional provisions that any citizen may speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty, and that all citizens have equal civil and political rights and public privileges, and that the general assembly shall not pass any law abridging freedom of speech or of the press. While no stress is laid by the court in this case on any distinction between an expression of sentiments on the one hand and obscene descriptions, illegal advertisements, false and malicious statements of fact on the other hand, yet the distinction seems too plain to be overlooked when we bring the cases into comparison.

II. Libels.

The relation of the constitutional right to free speech and a free press to the law of libel and slander may be indicated by saying that the constitutional right does not include the right to indulge in libel or slander. The question what constitutes a libel or slander is outside the range of the present subject. The protection of free speech under the Constitution may often be claimed when the only question really in dispute is the question whether the language in question is libelous or slanderous. If it is, the constitutional provision does not apply. This is made evident by all the decisions.

That libel laws and the punishment of libelers do not infringe the constitutional freedom of the press, is, in substance, declared in Morton v. State, 3 Tex. App. 510; Storey v. People, 79 Ill. 45, 22 Am. Rep. 158; Runkle v. Meyer, 3 Yeates, 518, 2 Am. Dec. 393; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; State, Haskell, v. Faulds, 17 Mont. 140; Respublica v. Dennie, 4 Yeates, 267, 2 Am. Dec. 402; Cobbett's Case, Wharton, St. Tr. 323; Cincinnati Gazette Co. v. Timberlake, 17 Ohio St. 548, 78 Am. Dec. 285, Affirming Timberlake v. Cincinnati Gazette Co. 1 Disney (Ohio) 322; Jones v. Townsend, 21 Fla. 431, 58 Am. Rep. 676; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 182, 31 Am. Rep. 757, and in all other cases in which the question has been presented.

The meaning of the Bill of Rights and the Constitution of Pennsylvania, declaring "that the freedom of the press shall not be restrained," was considered in Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 319. This was in 1788. The court said: "The true liberty of the press is amply secured by permitting every man to publish his opinions; but it is due to the peace and dignity of society to inquire into the motives of such publications, and to distinguish between those which are meant for use and reformation . . . and those which are intended merely to delude and defame. To the latter description, it is impossible that any good government should afford protection and impunity."

III. Prevention of speech or publication.

Already it has been mentioned above that the question of the constitutionality of any attempt to prevent rather than to punish abuses of speech or publication is not yet determined decisively by the decisions of the courts.

General language is found in a considerable number of cases to the effect that the liberty of the press consists in freedom from the necessity of obtaining a license before printing.

Thus, Blackstone says that the liberty of the press is by no means infringed or violated by the punishment of libelers, and that this liberty "consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published." 4 Bl. Com. *152.

So in Ring v. De in St. Asaph, 3 T. R. 431, note, it is said on an indictment for libel: "The liberty of the press consists in printing without any previous license, subject to the consequence of law. The li-

Covenants running with land form a complete analogy to this, and if the subject of the lease were land there can be no question as to the rights of a lessee to the protection to the extent of his estate against breach of such covenants.

If the contract is valid no evasions of it will be tolerated. Such contracts will be specifically enforced in equity and a breach of them be restrained by injunction.

If there is one thing more than another that public policy requires it is that persons of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty at all consistent with the public good, of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by the courts of justice.

centiousness of the press is Pandora's box, the source of every evil."

Lord Ellenborough, in summing up to the jury in the case of Cobbett's Case, 29 How. St. Tr. 49, said: "The law of England is a law of liberty, and, consistently with this liberty, we have not what is called an imprimatur; there is no such preliminary license necessary. But, if a man publish a paper, he is exposed to the penal consequences, as he is in every other act, if it be illegal."

Also, in Respublica v. Dennie, 4 Yeates, 267, 2 Am. Dec. 402, it is said on an indictment for libel that the liberty of the press means: "There shall be no licenses of the press. Publish as you please in the first instance without control; but you are answerable both to the community and the individual, if you proceed to unwarrantable lengths."

Again, in Cobbett's Case, Wharton, St. Tr. 323, McKean, J., says the liberty of the press "consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter, when published." This was in a charge to the grand jury on the subject of libel.

Similar words are used in the libel case of Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 182, 31 Am. Rep. 757, where the judge says: "The liberty of the press consists in a right, in the conductor of a newspaper, to print whatever he chooses without any previous license, but subject to be held responsible therefor to exactly the same extent that anyone else would be responsible for the publication."

Another court says that the liberty of the press means simply that no previous license to publish shall be required, but not that the publisher of a newspaper shall be any less responsible than another person would be for publishing otherwise the same libelous matter. Jones v. Townsend, 21 Fla. 431, 58 Am. Rep. 676.

But in none of the cases above mentioned was there any question to be decided as to any attempt to prevent speech or publication; but the above expressions were all used in an attempt to define the extent of the right of free speech or free press rather than the remedy for its abuse. Yet there are a few cases in which the constitutionality of attempts to restrain speech or publication have been considered, and these cases are not in harmony.

In Story on Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, § 948*a*, it is said that "courts have never assumed, at least since the destruction of the court of star chamber, to restrain any publication which purports to be a literary work, upon the mere ground that it is of a libelous character, and tends to the degradation or injury of the reputation or business of the plaintiff who seeks relief against such publication. For matters of this sort do not properly fall within the jurisdiction of courts of equity to redress, but are cognizable, in a civil or criminal suit, at law."

An injunction against the publication of a pamphlet which purported to be a literary work, undoubtedly a tale of fiction, on the ground that it was intended as a libel, but which was not shown to injure any property right, was denied by Chancellor Walworth in Brandreth v. Lance, 8 Paige, 24, 34 Am. Dec. 368, in which he said that since the court of star chamber in England was abolished he believed there was but one case on record in England or in this country in which a court had attempted by injunction or order to prohibit or restrain the publication of a libel, as such, in anticipation. The exception mentioned was in the case of Chief Justice Scroggs, mentioned below. But the chancellor's opinion shows that the want of any showing that any property right was injured was deemed material, and leaves room to suppose that he would have sustained an injunction against a publication which injured property rights.

One of the grounds named in the articles of impeachment of Chief Justice Scroggs in 1680 was his order prohibiting the printing of a certain book called "The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, or The History of Popery,"—"in a most illegal and arbitrary manner." This impeachment matter was dropped on the prorogation of Parliament, although Scroggs was removed from being Chief Justice, which was done with all the marks of favor and respect, giving him a pension for life. Scroggs' Case, 8 How. St. Tr. 198.

A dictum of Lord Ellenborough in the case of Du Bost v. Beresford, 2 Campb. 511, states that an injunction would have been granted on application against the exhibition of a libelous picture.

But in the report of Horne's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 799, it is said that the promulgation of this doctrine "excited great astonishment in the minds of all the practitioners of the courts of equity, and I apprehended that this must have happened; since I believe there is not to be found in the books any decision or any dictum, posterior to the days of the star chamber, from which such doctrine can be

If the contract be reasonable when made, subsequent circumstances, such as the covenantee ceasing business so as to no longer need protection, do not affect its operation.

Where the public right or welfare would not be injuriously affected by allowing the particular contract to be enforced, such contract being otherwise valid and not inequitable, courts have never assumed to set it aside or refused enforcement merely because a party has imposed upon himself unnecessary restraints in the matter of contracting, engaging in business, or accepting employment.

We understand liberty of speech and of the press to imply not only liberty to publish, but complete immunity from legal censure and punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character when tested by such standards as the law affords.

deduced, either directly, or by inference or analogy, unless, indeed, we are to except the proceedings of Lord Ellenborough's predecessor, Scroggs, and his associates, in the case of Henry Care," referring to the order above mentioned. Yet injunctions against publications which injure property rights are by no means unknown in England.

In the recent case of Dailey v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. (Cal.) 32 L. R. A. 273, an injunction against speaking or publishing what is injurious or unlawful is regarded by the majority of the court as a violation of the constitutional right to "freely speak, write, and publish." In that case it was held that the production in a theatre of a play based upon the facts of a criminal case then on trial could not be prevented by injunction, even if the play might interfere with the administration of justice and deprive the accused of a fair trial and constitute a punishable contempt; in short, that a person's mouth "could not be closed in advance for the purpose of preventing an utterance of his sentiments, however mischievous the prospective results of such utterance. He had the right of free speech, but at all times was responsible to the law for an abuse of that right." So far as this constitutional right is concerned it was said: "It is immaterial whether the words be publicly spoken from the stage, or upon the hustings, or go out to the world through the channels of the printing press."

An injunction against the publication by a state board of charities of their proceedings in respect to a juvenile guardian society and its officers, on the ground that their examinations were secret and ex parte, and that the testimony of the officers and employees of the society is essentially suppressed or garbled and perverted in the publication, and that the accounts of the proceedings as published are untrue, defamatory, and libelous, was denied in New York Juvenile Guardian Soc. v. Roosevelt, 7 Daly, 188. The court said that the exercise of any such jurisdiction was repugnant to the constitutional right of every citizen freely to speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right, and that if the publication was libelous the remedy was by civil action or by indictment in the criminal courts.

It is said, in Dopp v. Doll, 13 Week. L. Bull. (Ohio) 335, by the Cuyahoga court of common pleas, that there is a constitutional guaranty of freedom from any censorship or control of the press or of free speech except by an action for damages. This was a case in which an injunction against circulars charging infringement of a patent and warning prospective purchasers against it was denied.

An injunction against the publication of libelous statements injurious to business was denied in Life Asso. of America v. Boogher, 3 Mo. App. 173, on the ground that it was prohibited by the constitutional guaranty of the right to freely speak, write, or print on any subject. The court said: "The sovereign power has forbidden any instrumentality of the government it has instituted to limit or restrain this right except by the fear of the penalty, civil or criminal, which may wait on abuse. The general assembly can pass no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; it can only punish the licentious abuse of that freedom;" and added "that courts of justice can do nothing by way of judicial sentence which the general assembly has no power to sanction." This was said in answer to the contention that the Constitution did not give a license to wantonly use the right, and that, by the jurisdiction claimed, the right to speak, write, or print is only suspended until it can be determined judicially whether the exercise of it in the particular case be allowable. But on this point it may be said that an injunction against defamatory publications which is not granted until the court has decided that they are defamatory does not suspend any right whatever, since when it is determined that the publication is defamatory it is also determined that there is no right to publish it; that is, that the publication is outside of the constitutional guaranty.

Thus it appears that in several cases the courts have held the constitutional provision to be a bar against any prevention of publications by injunction, even where property rights were involved. On the other hand in a considerable number of cases injunctions have been granted against the publication of injurious and wrongful statements.

Thus, in Flint v. Hutchinson Smoke Burner Co. 110 Mo. 492, 16 L. R. A. 243, it is held that an injunction could not be granted against a slander of title or letters patent until the question of slander had been determined in an action at law; but the court expressly says: "After verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, they can have an injunction to restrain any further publication of that which the jury has found to be an actionable libel or slander." In a style, his power, his pathos, his humor, his learning, or of any gift or attainment, attracts subscribers solely by such personal qualities, he imparts a peculiar value to the goodwill and property of a newspaper, which goes with him, to its injury, when he leaves it and lends the talent and accomplishments that have given it patronage and popularity to a rival journal in the same vicinity. Where he owns the press and plant the enhanced value so imparted by him becomes an element of his property, with the same incidental power to dispose of it as attaches to any other of his acquisitions which has a market value. Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich., at page 529. But it is not like other property, which ordinarily passes by delivery or assignment to the purchaser. Neither an editor, a lawyer, nor a physician can transfer to another his style, his learning, or his manners. Either, however, can add to the chances of success and profit of another who embarks in the same business in the same field, by withdrawing as a competitor. So that the one sells and the other buys something valuable, and the policy of the law limits the right to enter into such contracts of sale only to the extent that they are held to injure the public by restraining trade. The one sells his prospective patronage, and the other buys the right to compete with all others for it, and to be protected against competition from his vendor. The law intends that the one shall have the lawful authority to dispose of his right to compete, but restricts his power of disposition territorially so as to make it only coextensive with the right to protection on the part of the purchaser. To the extent that the contract covers territory from which the vendor has derived, and will probably in future derive, no profit or patronage, it needlessly deprives the public of the benefit of open competition in useful business, and of the services of him who sells without any possible advantage to his successor. When the reason upon which

note to this case conflicting authorities are considered, and it is said that the weight of authority as shown by the later cases is to the effect that such an injunction may be granted if the threats to prosecute for an infringement are not made in good faith. About a dozen cases are cited to this effect. These did not directly pass upon the constitutional provision here in question, although in the Hutchinson Case just mentioned, which was based on the constitutional right of trial by jury, the court says: "It goes hand in hand with the liberty of the press and free speech. For unbridled use of the tongue or pen the law furnishes a remedy." The case merely decides, therefore, that the fact of libel or slander must first be found by a jury, and then an injunction may be granted to restrain the unlawful publication.

In the later case of Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark Arrester Co. 135 Ind. 471, 22 L. R. A. 332, it is expressly decided that the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of the press and of speech is not a protection against equitable interference with the publication of false and injurious statements. This also was a case of injunction against false and malicious claims of title to a patent with threats of an infringement suit.

An injunction against the publication of a receipt book was granted in Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 490, where the publication was in violation of a contract by which a person had sold his business, including the right to publish a similar receipt book.

The question has also arisen in proceedings to punish contempt of an injunction.

Thus, a conspiracy to incite the employees of a railroad receiver to leave his service, and a continuance of participation therein after an injunction against it, are held to constitute a contempt of court, in Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 62 Fed. Rep. 803, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 788. The court said: "Something has been said about the right of assembly and free speech secured by the Constitution of Ohio. It would be strange, indeed, if that right could be used to sustain the carrying out of such an unlawful and criminal conspiracy as we have seen this to be." The decision not only sustains the validity of an injunction against the use of one's tongue to further an unlawful conspiracy, but punishes a violation of such injunction as a contempt.

Reviewing the above cases, it appears that several have denied an injunction against publications, and others have granted such relief. Of those that deny, some imply that publications wrongfully injuring property rights may be enjoined; others grant injunctions in such cases, while in the note above referred to (16 L. R. A. 243) are found still other cases granting such injunctions in which no question was raised as to the constitutional right of the freedom of the press.

Not only injunctions like the above, but every injunction against an infringement of copyright, and at least most injunctions against infringement of trademarks and tradenames, do to some extent interfere with freedom of publication, as does also the injunction in COWAN V. FAIRBROTHER against publishing a newspaper. Yet it does not appear that such infringing publications have ever been thought to be within the constitutional protection of the freedom of the press. Thus, without expressly deciding it, the courts in all such cases have assumed that an abuse of the liberty of speech or of the press could be constitutionally restrained in anticipation, and that unlimited license of unlawful speech or publication, without any check or hindrance except by way of punishment for commission of the offense, is not guaranteed by the Constitution.

On the question of the right to express opinions or comments without misstating facts, the authorities are analyzed in a note to St. James Military Academy v. Gaiser (Mo.) 28 L. R. A. 667. The literal statement of the constitutional guaranty, when it is anything more than a general declaration of freedom of speech and of the press, does not, in most constitutions, extend beyond the free expression of "sentiments" or "opinions." It seems plain that there is a distinction between the expression of an opinion or sentiment and the making of false statements of fact, and it is by no means certain that the constitutional protection is not entirely limited to the expression of comments, opinions, sentiments, or something equivalent thereto. As well defined in the above case of COWAN V. FAIRBROTHER it is a guaranty against "stifling just criticism or muzzling public opinion." If this is so, malicious and false statements of fact are altogether outside of the constitutional protection. Thus construed the Constitution would not prevent an injunction against injurious and libelous misstatements of fact any more than it prevents the punishment of them after their publication.

It is certain that the courts have not yet clearly settled the application of these constitutional provisions, and it is suggested that a final settlement of them will be aided by considering carefully what is included among the "sentiments," "opinions," or equivalent words used in the constitutional provisions on this subject. B. A. R.

a law is founded ceases, the rule itself ceases to operate. The older cases in which the courts attempted to fix arbitrarily geographical bounds, beyond which a contract to forbear from competition would not be enforced, have given way to the more rational idea of making every case dependent upon the surrounding circumstances, showing the extent, as to time and territory, of the protection needed. Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & A. Co. [1894] A. C. 535; Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Ad. & El. 438; Herreshoff v. Boutineau, 17 R. I. 3, 8 L. R. A. 469; National Benefit Co. v. Union Hospital Co. 45 Minn. 272, 11 L. R. A. 437; Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 490; Tallis v. Tallis, 1 El. & Bl. 391, 18 Eng. L. & Eq. 151; Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 22 L. ed. 315; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 947, note; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 885, note; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S 396 32 L. ed. 979. Where the nature of the business was such that complete protection could not be otherwise afforded, the restraint upon the right to compete has been held good in one or more instances where it extended throughout the world, and in other cases where it applied to a state, or to a boundary including several states. In Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & A. Co. supra, the plaintiff had covenanted with the respondent company "not to engage, except on behalf of such company, either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns or ammunition, or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that carried on by such company." On appeal to the House of Lords the case of Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 743, was cited, and the validity of such contracts was declared to depend upon the question "whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favor of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public." Lord Herschell, L. C. said further: "'Whatever restraint is larger than the necessary protection of the party can be of no benefit to either; it can only be oppressive, and, if oppressive, it is, in the eye of the law, unreasonable.' The tendency in later cases has certainly been to allow a restriction in point of space which formerly would have been thought unreasonable, manifestly because of the improved means of communication. A radius of 150 or even 200 miles has not been held to be too much in some cases. For the same reason I think a restriction applying to the entire kingdom may in some cases be requisite and justifiable." In Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich., at page 530, Judge Campbell quotes with approval the language of Chief Justice Chapman in Morse Twist Drill Mach. Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 77, 4 Am. Rep. 513, where he said: "In this country there are periodical publications that have a very wide circulation, and it is obvious that a purchaser of the proprietorship cannot afford to pay the full value, unless he can obtain from the vendor a valid restriction against competition, which restriction shall be as extensive as his interest requires, though it may cover the whole of a state, or the whole country. The same would be true as to some books. For example, the author of a popular school book could not sell its proprietorship for its full value, unless he could bind himself not to prepare another book which should be used in competition with it."

The rule which concedes the right to make the area in which the vendor is to be restricted from competition as broad as is necessary to afford ample protection to the purchaser is subject to the qualification that no agreement will be upheld which is injurious to the public interest. Nordenfelt's Case [1894] A. C., at page 549. There are two familiar classes of contracts that will in no event be enforced, because contrary to public policy, and these constitute exceptions to the general rule governing sales of the right of competition: (1) A quasi-public corporation cannot disable itself by contract from performing the public duties which it has undertaken to discharge in consideration of the privileges granted to it. Logan v. North Carolina R. Co. 116 N. C. 940; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 410, 32 L. ed. 984. (2) Any agreement in contravention of the common or statute law generally, or any combination among those engaged in a business impressed with a public or quasi-public character, which is manifestly prejudicial to the public interest, is void as against public policy; and, upon the same principle, no agreement tending to create a monopoly, or designed to utterly destroy fair competition amongst public carriers, will be enforced. State, Atty. Gen., v. Standard Oil Co. 49 Ohio St. 137, 15 L. R. A. 145; Emery v. Ohio Candle Co. 47 Ohio St. 320, 21 Am. St. Rep. 819, and note; Hooker v. Vandewater, 4 Denio, 349, 47 Am. Dec. 258. But the contract of which the plaintiff claims the benefit, as assignee through John Jenkins, is one which in no way affects the public, unless it unreasonably deprives the people of the state of the benefit of the industry of the defendants, or unnecessarily precludes them from supporting their family by pursuing their occupation. Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall., at page 68, 22 L. ed. 318. The stipulation was that the defendant Fairbrother "would not edit, print, or conduct a newspaper or magazine, nor be in any wise connected with one printed anywhere in the state of North Carolina, and that for a like period Mrs. Fairbrother shall not edit, print, or conduct a newspaper or magazine, nor be in any wise connected with one, anywhere in the county of Durham, said state, without the consent of said purchaser or his assignees." This contract was assigned to Watts and Duke by Jenkins, and the assignees who own the property have leased to the plaintiff, Cowan, who is now publishing the Globe newspaper, and seeks to enjoin the defendant Al. Fairbrother and the other defendant from publishing another newspaper in Durham, as it is conceded they purpose to do if the court should not interfere. Since the use of steam, space has been, in a measure, annihilated; and it is a fact, of which the courts may take notice, that a newspaper may be carried by mail to the most remote parts of the state within from twenty four to forty-eight hours. So that, if there has ever been a time in the history of the state when an editor could not acquire a reputation for excellence in some particular line of that business which would enable him to give a paper with which he might be connected popularity throughout its limits, there is no reason to doubt now that one who would rid himself of a competitor in that business is not describing an unreasonable boundary when he extends the restriction against competition to the state lines. No better proof of that fact could be adduced than is set forth in the uncontradicted affidavits of the defendants themselves,—that they injured their successor, John Jenkins, in the conduct of the Durham Globe, after the contract was entered into, by publishing a paper in Lynchburg, Va. If the right to compete for popularity as an editor may become valuable, and pass by a contract of sale, like the goodwill of a newspaper, it follows necessarily, as a logical sequence, that the purchaser may sell and transfer to a third party the right to occupy a field vacated by a dangerous rival, and the transaction would be held valid for the same reason that renders the original sale enforceable. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 885, and note, with authorities collected; Beal v. Chase, supra; Perkins v. Clay, 54 N. H. 518; Hedge v. Lowe, 47 Iowa, 137; Gompers v. Rochester, 56 Pa. 194. It is settled law that such contracts in restraint of trade as are valid may be enforced in equity, like other contracts, and that breaches of them will be restrained by injunction, on the ground that no other remedy is adequate. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 885, and note; Thompson v. Andrus, 73 Mich. 557. A covenant on the part of a publisher not to publish a paper is considered in the same light as a contract to sell a particular business, or the right to practice a profession in a given area, and courts of equity will interpose in order to prevent a violation of the one as well as of the other. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 947, note.

The plaintiff's lessors swear that they had never abandoned at any time the purpose to continue the publication of the newspaper, and that during the suspension they kept up continual negotiations with that end in view. They say, further, that the suspension was prolonged by giving an option to one with whom they had good reason to expect they might conclude a contract to again issue it regularly. A review of all the cases where it has been held that parties have abandoned rights will furnish no analogy to support the contention that the benefit of a contract like that which is the subject of the action must be deemed in law abandoned for failure to find a suitable editor for so short a time, especially where it appeared that reasonably diligent efforts were being made to have the business continued. The concealment by Jenkins of the fact that he was buying for another was not per se a fraudulent act, and there is no allegation on the part of defendants that he practiced any fraud upon them. Fraud cannot be inferred from the fact of buying property through an agent who is instructed to take title in his own name. If the defendants had set up a state of facts which in law amounted to fraud, and had asked the court to rescind the contract upon the principle that he who asks equity must do equity, they would have been required to offer to return the money received. In order to avail themselves of that remedy, they should have brought suit to set aside the agreement upon the discovery of the fraud, if there was fraud, and should have offered to place the purchasers in statu quo. California Steam Nav. Co. v. Wright, 8 Cal. 585, 592.

It is contended for defendants that the contract is illegal and void because it is in contravention of the provision of the Constitution (art. 1, § 20) which guarantees the freedom of the press. When the framers of our Constitution declared that the freedom of the press was one of the bulwarks of liberty, and therefore ought never to be restrained, but that every individual should be held responsible for the abuse of the same, they entertained no purpose to restrict the power of any person to dispose of anything of value, which, as the creature of his own mental or physical exertions, had become his property. This right is as much a fundamental one as is that to use the press without violation of reasonable laws intended to protect others from libel and slander. In its broadest sense, "freedom of the press" includes, not only exemption from censorship, but security against laws enacted by the legislative department of the government, or measures resorted to by either of the other branches for the purpose of stifling just criticism or muzzling public opinion. Black, Const. Law, pp. 472, 473; Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 517, 518; Ordronaux, Constitutional Legislation, pp. 236 et seq.; 3 Story, Const. p. 731.

An indefinite number of authorities might be added to show the universal interpretation placed upon the provision in the Constitution of the United States that the freedom of the press shall not be abridged, and upon similar clauses in state constitutions. It has never been held anywhere that these provisions could be made engines of oppression, by construing them as restrictions upon the right to sell anything of value that is the creature of one's brain, provided society would not be made to suffer by the transaction.

Upon a review of all of the assignments, we discover no error in the rulings below, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Hiram C. DAUGHERTY, Appt.,
v.
Adam HERZOG.

(.....Ind.....)

Negligence of a contractor in reconstructing a building will not render him liable to a third person who is injured in consequence thereof after the work has been completed and accepted by the owner of the building.

(June 10, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Tippecanoe County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's daughter by reason of the fall of defendant's building. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. E. Lake, William B. Wood, and George P. Haywood for appellant.

Mr. R. P. Davidson for appellee.

Monks, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While passing along a sidewalk on Main street, in the city of Lafayette, appellant's daughter was killed by the falling of the front wall of a building which stood upon the street line, adjacent to the sidewalk. This action was brought by appellant against appellee to recover damages for loss of services occasioned by her death. Appellee's demurrer was sustained to each paragraph of complaint, and, appellant refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered for appellee. The facts alleged, essential to the decision of the question presented, are as follows: One O'Ferrall for many years had been the owner of the three-story brick building, on the north line of Main street, which caused the accident, consisting of two ground floor business rooms, one of which was occupied by one Lohman as a drug store. The other room becoming vacant, Lohman desired it also, and wished the two rooms thrown into one, by the removal of the partition brick wall. To this O'Ferrall consented, and thereupon O'Ferrall or Lohman, or both, employed the defendant, Herzog, this appellee, who was a builder and contractor, by an independent contract, to remove the wall and remodel the building to Lohman's wishes. This work he completed, and turned the building over to Lohman, who recccupied it as a drug store from 1890 until 1892, when the disaster occurred which took the life of the appellant's daughter. It is alleged that the appellee did his work unskilfully and defectively, put in iron posts not sufficiently secured upon the under wall, and did not sufficiently fasten and tie together the iron or steel beams resting on the tops of these posts, and in some other respects negligently did his work, and that, because of this negligent and imperfect reconstruction of the building, it fell. The only error assigned calls in question the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

The rule is that an action for negligence will not lie unless the defendant was under some duty to the injured party, at the time and place where the injury occurred, which he has omitted to perform. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Griffin, 100 Ind. 221, 222, 50 Am. Rep. 783; Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 532, and cases cited; Faris v. Hoberg, 134 Ind. 269, 274; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Treadway, 142 Ind., on pages 485 and 486. If appellee failed to repair the building in conformity with his contract, he was liable to respond in damages therefor to the other contracting party. But is he also liable to appellant for the injury to his daughter, sustained on account of the defective construction alleged, when neither appellant nor his daughter were parties to the contract? Appellee was not liable under the contract, for the reason that such liability could only exist between the contracting parties. If liable at all, it can only be for the violation of some duty. Faris v. Hoberg, supra; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Griffin, supra; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 8. The only person to whom appellee owed any particular duty was the one with whom he contracted. State, Travelers' Ins. Co., v. Harris, 89 Ind. 363, 365, 366, 46 Am. Rep. 169. Appellee was not in possession of the building. The repairs had been completed and accepted long before appellant's daughter was injured. The rule in this class of cases is thus stated in Wharton on Negligence, 2d ed. § 439: "There must be causal connection between the negligence and the hurt; and such causal connection is interrupted by the interposition, between the negligence and the hurt, of any independent human agency. Thus, a contractor is employed by a city to build a bridge in a workmanlike manner; and after he has finished his work, and it has been accepted by the city, a traveler is hurt when passing over it by a defect caused by the contractor's negligence. Now the contractor may be liable on his contract to the city for his negligence, but he is not liable to the traveler in an action on the case for damages. The reason sometimes given to sustain such a conclusion is, that otherwise there would be no end to suits. But a better ground is, that there is no causal connection between the traveler's hurt and the contractor's negligence. The traveler reposed no confidence on the contractor, nor did the contractor accept any confidence from the traveler. The traveler, no doubt, reposed confidence on the city that it would have its bridges and highways in good order; but between the contractor and the traveler intervened the city, an independent responsible agent, breaking the causal connection. In Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 109, the plaintiff proved that a mail coach had been defectively constructed; that it was constructed under a contract with the postmaster general; and that, because of its defective construction, plaintiff sustained an injury. And the court denied a recovery upon the ground that the coach maker owed plaintiff no duty. Lord Abinger, in the course of his opinion, said: "Unless we confine the operation of such contracts as this to the parties who entered into them, the most absurd and outrageous consequences, to which I can see no limit, would ensue." To the same effect was the statement of Justice Clifford in National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621, that "there would be no bounds to actions and litigious intricacies if the ill effects of the negligence of men may be followed down the chain of results to the final effect." In Losee v. Clute, 51 N. Y. 494, 10 Am. Rep. 638, it was held that the manufacturer and builder of a steam boiler is only liable to the purchaser for defective materials, or for any want of care or skill in its construction, and if after delivery to and acceptance by the purchaser, and while in use by him, an explosion occurs, in consequence of such defective construction, to the injury of a third person, the latter has no cause of action, on account of such injury, against the manufacturer. In Dale v. Grant, 34 N. J. L. 142, it was held that an action would not lie in favor of a customer against a wrongdoer who stopped the machinery of a manufactory, and prevented the proprietor from performing a contract, and thereby caused loss to the plaintiff, to whom the manufacturer had agreed to furnish goods. The court said: "But the law does not attempt to give full reparation to all parties injured by a wrong committed. If this were so, all parties holding contracts, if such exist, under the plaintiffs who have been injuriously affected by the conduct of the defendants, would be entitled to a suit. It is only the proximate injury that the law endeavors to compensate; the more remote comes under the head of damnum absque injuria." The cases of Winterbottom v. Wright, Dale v. Grant, and Losee v. Clure, supra,—were cited with approval by this court in Hoosier Stone Co. v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 131 Ind. 575, and State, Travelers' Ins. Co., v. Harris, 89 Ind. 363, 46 Am. Rep. 169. It was held in Curtin v. Somerset, 140 Pa. 70, 12 L. R. A. 322, that a contractor for the erection of an hotel building, who uses improper material in its construction, and in other respects departs from the specifications embodied in his contract, so that when the building is completed it is structurally weak and unsafe, by which an accident occurs after it is accepted and possession taken, is liable to the owner therefor, but not to a guest of the hotel for an injury caused to him by such defective construction. The court said: "In Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, the court held a dealer in drugs and medicines, who carelessly labels a deadly poison as a harmless medicine, and sends it so labeled into market, to be liable to all persons who, without fault on their parts, are injured by using it. We think this case was correctly decided, but it has no application. The druggist owed a duty to every person to whom he sold a deadly poison, to have it properly labeled to avoid accidents. Just here the analogy between this case and the one in hand ceases. The defendant owed no duty to the public, as before stated; his duty was to his employer. . . . If the contractor who erects a house, who builds a bridge, or performs any other work; a manufacturer who constructs a boiler, piece of machinery, or a steamship, owes a duty to the whole world, that his work or his machine or his steamship shall contain no hidden defect, it is difficult to measure the extent of his responsibility, and no prudent man would engage in such occupations upon such conditions. It is safer and wiser to confine such liabilities to the parties immediately concerned." In Necker v. Harvey, 49 Mich. 517, the defendant manufactured, and put up in the factory of a soap company, an elevator, under a contract that it would lift at least 2,000 pounds. The elevator fell, by reason of a defective shaft, in three days after it had been put in place, and injured a workman in the employ of the soap company. The court, by Cooley, J., said: "The statement of facts so far makes out no cause of action in favor of this plaintiff. It discloses a duty on the part of the defendant to construct an elevator which would lift 2,000 pounds; but the duty was to the soap company, and not to anybody else. Nothing is better settled than that an action will not lie in favor of any third party upon a breach of this duty." There is a class of cases, however, where the law imposes a duty to third persons, independent of the contract, as in sales of dangerous goods, poisonous drugs, or explosive oils. Thomas v. Winchester, supra; Walton v. Booth, 34 La. Ann. 913; Callahan v. Warne, 40 Mo. 131; Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 8 Am. Rep. 298; Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co. 104 Mass. 64; 2 Jaggard, Torts, § 261. In this class of cases the vendor owes a duty to the public, for the reason that the articles sold were necessarily and inherently dangerous to human life, and did not in any manner disclose their dangerous character. The cases cited by appellant fall within this class, and are therefore not in point. It is clear, we think, from the authorities, that a contractor, in a case like the one in hand, is not liable, for mere negligence, to a third party to whom he owed no duty. The conclusion we have reached is also fully sustained by Heizer v. Kingsland & D. Mfg. Co. 110 Mo. 605, 15 L. R. A. 821, and cases cited in note 424, p. 908, 2 Jaggard, Torts.

Judgment affirmed.

1. The majority of a church which has abandoned the religious faith on which the church was founded cannot hold the church property against the minority, which adheres to the original doctrines.

NOTE.—For division of church, see also Krecker v. Shirey (Pa.) 29 L. R. A. 476; Bear v. Heasley (Mich.) 24 L. R. A. 615; Philomath College v. Wyatt (Or.) 26 L. R. A. 68; Schlichter v. Keiter (Pa.) 22 L. R. A. 161, and Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore (Iowa) 13 L. R. A. 198.

As to power of local church to withdraw from general body, see note to Fuchs v. Meisel (Mich.) 32 L. R. A. 92.

2. The excommunication by a majority faction of a church of the minority members who still adhere to the original faith and claim to be the church, cannot affect the rights of the minority to the church property.

3. The minority members of a church, acting in harmony with its ecclesiastical laws and adhering to the faith, constitute the church as against a majority which has departed from the faith.

4. The "means" doctrine, to the effect that conversions and salvation may be aided by the use of human means, is a departure from the faith of a "regular Baptist church," which is strongly Calvinistic.

5. Historical facts showing an irreconcilable conflict between Calvinistic and Arminian doctrines are within judicial notice.

6. An answer to a complaint by trustees of a church denying that they are trustees and averring that defendants instead are trustees, wherefore judgment is demanded for costs and all proper relief, does not raise an issue as to the legal election of the trustees.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. On petition for rehearing. Rehearing denied.

For former opinion see 19 L. R. A. 433.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellees have presented what they call a "petition for a rehearing." It is, however, not a petition, measured by rule of this court No. 37. It is but an elaborate printed brief or argument of sixty-two closely-printed pages. The rule requires a petition "setting forth the cause for which the judgment is supposed to be erroneous." The same rule also requires a brief in support of the petition. We would be justified in disregarding the so-called "petition," but the importance of the questions involved induces us to carefully reconsider the questions discussed in such brief. The entire argument therein is confined to four propositions: (1) That the opinion is based on an incorrect statement of the facts established by the evidence, to the effect that the appellees and those represented by them had departed from the original faith upon which the church was founded; (2) that it was wholly immaterial if they had so departed so long as they constituted a majority of the membership of the church; (3) that appellants could not recover, because all their interest in the church property, and the interest of those they represent, had ceased, by reason of their expulsion from the church before the suit was brought; and (4) that they could not recover, even if all other questions of law and fact were decided in their favor, for the reason that appellants were not legally elected trustees, there being no vacancy in the offices of trustees of said church, and those electing them not being members of the church, by reason of such expulsion, and not being a majority of the church.

The leading case cited in support of the proposition that the majority of a church divided into two conflicting bodies may hold the church property, though such majority have abandoned the religious faith on which it is founded, is Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666. That was a case where the Third or Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, of Louisville, Ky., became divided into two conflicting bodies, each claiming to be the church, and each claiming the right to the control and possession of the church edifice and property. The case has no application here, because the division there did not arise out of any difference in religious faith or belief, nor was there any claim that either side had changed their religious belief from that on which the church was founded. But the division was solely on account of differences in political belief. One side adhered to the cause of the Union during the war of the rebellion, and the other side adhered to the cause of the rebellion. Appellees' counsel quote most of the following passage in the opinion in that case in support of their contention: "The second class of cases which we have described has reference to the case of a church of a strictly congregational or independent organization, governed solely within itself, either by a majority of its members, or by such local organizations as it may have instituted for the purpose of ecclesiastical government and to property held by such a church, either by way of purchase or donation, with no other specific trust attached to it, in the hands of the church, than it is for the use of that congregation as a religious society. In such a case, where there is a schism which leads to a separation into distinct and conflicting bodies, the rights of such bodies must be determined by the ordinary principles which govern voluntary associations. If the principle of government in such cases is that the majority rules, then the numerical majority of members must control the right to use the property. If there be within the congregation officers in whom are vested the powers of church control, than those who adhere to the acknowledged organism by which the body is governed are entitled to the use of the property. The minority, in choosing to separate themselves into a distinct body, and refusing to recognize the authority of the governing body, can claim no rights in the property from the fact that they had once been members of the church or congregation. This rule admits of no inquiry into the existing religious opinions of those who comprise the legal or regular organization; for, if such was permitted, a very small minority without any officers of the church among them, might be found to be the only faithful supporters of the religious dogmas of the founders of the church. There being no such trust imposed upon the property when purchased or given, the court will not imply one for the purpose of expelling from its use those who, by regular succession and order constitute the church, because they have changed in some respect their views of religious truth." There was not only no case before the court of a church divided into two factions on account of one of them having abandoned the original faith on which it was founded, but the court was not speaking of such a case, nor a violation of a trust arising out of such a case by the use of the house of worship by the departing majority. The existing religious opinions, the right of inquiry into which is denied in the opinion, have no reference to the original faith on which the church was founded, but have reference rather to the conflicting views of the two opposing bodies as to the Christian duty to adhere to the lawful government of the country in time of war of rebellion. There was no pretense that the original faith on which the church was founded, in that case, made any declaration on that subject. There are many differences of opinion as to religious duty and practice among the members of the same denomination, and even of the same church, upon which the confession of articles of faith are silent; for instance, the propriety of attending balls or dances, playing cards, washing each other's feet, maintaining musical instruments in public worship, and the like, which differences ordinarily furnish no ground for a charge of a desertion of faith. It was such differences that led to the separation of the Third or Walnut Street Church, in Louisville, and it was that class of differences the court had in mind in the use of the language above quoted. That it was not intended to apply the language to all cases is rendered clear by another passage in the opinion, which counsel did not quote, and make no mention of. It reads thus: "In such case if the trust is confined to a religious congregation of the independent or congregational form of church government, it is not in the power of the majority of that congregation, however preponderant, by reason of a change of views on religious subjects, to carry the property so confided to them to the support of a new and conflicting doctrine. A pious man, building and dedicating a house of worship to the sole and exclusive use of those who believe in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and placing it under the control of a congregation which at the time holds the same belief, has a right to expect that the law will prevent that property from being used as a means of support and dissemination of the Unitarian doctrine, and a place of Unitarian worship. Nor is the principle varied when the organization to which the trust is confided is of the second or associated form of church government. The protection which the law throws around the trust is the same. And though the task may be a delicate one, and a difficult one, it will be the duty of the court, in such cases, when the doctrine to be taught, or the form of worship to be used, is definitely and clearly laid down, to inquire whether the party accused of violating the trust is holding or teaching a different doctrine, or using a form of worship which is so far variant as to defeat the declared objects of the trust." Therefore that case not only does not lend any sanction to the appellees' contention, but is against it.

The next case cited by appellees' counsel in support of the proposition in question is Keyser v. Stansifer, 6 Ohio St. 363. That also was a suit for possession of a church-house property by Keyser and others, a small faction of a Baptist church who had separated themselves from the church about a matter that had nothing whatever to do with the original faith upon which the church was founded. And it was held, in accordance with the rule laid down in the last-mentioned case, that, in such a division of a church, the property, as in ordinary voluntary associations, is held at the will of the majority. The division in the Ohio case was caused by the church's excluding Keyser on charges preferred against him in the course of discipline for misconduct. He afterwards got another member, named Cox, and some married women, to join him to sue for the church edifice. The ground on which he and his associates claimed that they were the real church was that some time after Keyser had been excluded the church adopted new articles of faith, or a creed, and abolished the old. But there was no pretense that the church had abandoned the original doctrine or faith upon which it was founded. The division arose entirely out of the exclusion of Keyser from the church in the course of discipline, and had no reference to any change or departure by the majority from the original faith on which the church had been founded.

The next case cited in support of the right of the majority to rule in matters of this kind is Shannon v. Frost, 3 B. Mon. 253. Counsel complainingly remark that "this case was cited by appellees in their original brief, . . . but no mention is made of it in the opinion rendered herein. It did not receive the cold respect of a passing glance." Counsel must speak from actual knowledge, in making this charge. One of them happens to know that all his statements are true, except that that case was in the original brief, because he knows that that case was not cited in the original brief, but was cited on a separate piece of paper, filed nearly a month after the original brief was filed. That paper contained nothing else but a citation of that case, and was filed on the same day the opinion was handed down, and after the case had been decided. Then the writer of the opinion pasted that paper fast to appellees' original brief. He knows it was too late then to give the case even the cold respect of a passing glance, after the cause in which it was cited had been decided. However, this court is not bound to cite and comment on all cases cited by counsel. Such citations may not be worthy of such notice. But the case has not the slightest bearing on the question of the rights of the majority faction of a divided church, who have departed from the original faith on which the church was founded, as against a minority faction adhering to such faith. It would be very much in point if there had been a division of the church in that case on a difference of religious belief, but there was no such division in that case. In that case seven members of a Baptist church in Frankfort, Ky., were regularly excommunicated from the church, presumably for immoral conduct. The expelled members, associating themselves with some other persons professing the same religion, organized themselves into a separate community of professed Christians, and elected trustees, which election was ratified by the county court of Franklin county. Afterwards, insisting on their right to enjoy to some extent the house of worship built for, and still occupied by, the original church, they took possession, and made periodical uses of it, without the consent and in defiance of the prohibition of the church. To settle the controversy the members of the original church sued to enjoin them. The defendants did not claim to own the church edifice, but claimed the right to use it a part of the time, under a statute of Kentucky. That statute provides for the election of trustees by religious societies, and, among other things, regulates the power and control by such trustees of the house of worship belonging to such church or society. It is also provided therein that in case of a division in any congregation or church, from any other cause than immorality of its members, the trustees are not to prevent either of the parties so divided from using the house or houses of worship for the purposes of devotion a part of the time, proportioned to the number of each party. It was under this provision that the defendants justified their attempted use of the house. There was no question of a difference of religious belief involved in the case between the two parties. The court of appeals held that the statute did not apply. The only other point decided was as to the legality of the election of the trustees by the plaintiffs constituting themselves into a new society. That point we shall notice further on.

The next case cited in support of the proposition in question is Petty v. Tooker, 21 N. Y. 267. That case does squarely hold that a religious society incorporated under the act of the legislature of 1813, in the state of New York, had power, through its trustees elected under that act, to change from a Congregational to a Presbyterian church, even over the protest of the minority of the members, and carry the church property with them. But that was owing to the peculiar provisions of the statute mentioned, and the peculiar construction placed upon it by the court of appeals of that state. Yet, at the same time, in cases of divided churches incorporated under previous statutes of that state, it was held uniformly by its courts, in harmony with all authority elsewhere, that a majority could not carry or divert the church property to a contrary doctrine and faith, against the objection of a minority of the membership of the church adhering to the original faith on which the church was founded. Miller v. Gable, 2 Denio, 492; Kniskern v. Lutheran Churches, 1 Sandf. Ch. 439. But that statute has been since modified, in a subsequent act of the legislature of that state. In Isham v. First Presby. Church, 63 How. Pr. 465, it was said: "As the act of 1813 has been construed, the members of the congregation of a religious corporation were, under its provisions, left at liberty to divert the church property from the dissemination of the views of the persons acquiring it to that of any other view, whether religious or secular, which might be sanctioned and adopted by a voting majority of the congregation (Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 243; Petty v. Tooker, 21 N. Y. 267; Burrel v. Associate Reformed Church, 44 Barb. 283). This was an extreme construction of the terms in which the carefully guarded act of 1813 was enacted, and by chapter 79 of the Laws of 1875 the legislature undertook its correction, and for that purpose provided and declared that the trustees of a religious society incorporated under the act of 1813 should administer its temporalities, and hold its property and revenues for the benefit of the corporation, according to the discipline, rules, and usages of the denomination to which the corporation belongs. Laws 1875, p. 79, § 4. This enactment was preserved, and in terms extended, by chapter 176 of the Laws of 1876. The plain purpose of these acts was to abrogate the rule which had grown out of the preceding construction given to the act of 1813, and to deprive the congregation, as well as the trustees of the society, of the power afterwards to divert the church property from the promotion and dissemination of the religious views of the persons obtaining and acquiring it, to the promulgation and maintenance of any different systems of religious belief. Instead of holding the property subject simply to the disposition of the voting majority of the congregation, the trustees were henceforward required to hold and devote it to the uses and purposes of the denomination of Christians in which the society should be included that obtained and acquired it. . . . It was manifestly unjust to allow persons becoming members of a religious society, formed for the purpose of inculcating particular views, by their subsequent votes to appropriate the property they might have done nothing to acquire to the promotion of views of an entirely different character from those entertained by the persons through whose contributions the property may have been obtained. This was the practical abuse which the laws of 1875-76 were designed in the future to prevent, and they are required to be so construed as to carry that policy into effect." To the same effect are First Reformed Presby. Church v. Bowden, 10 Abb. N. C. 1, 14 Abb. N. C. 356; Isham v. Fullager, 14 Abb. N. C. 363; Field v. Field, 9 Wend. 395. It thus appears that Petty v. Tooker, supra, so confidently relied on for a rehearing, is no longer the law or authority either in or out of the state of New York.

Counsel for appellees cite and quote from First Baptist Church v. Witherell, 3 Paige, 296, 24 Am. Dec. 223, without definitely stating what point it is designed by it to support, the following passage: "All questions relating to the faith and practice of the church and its members belong to the church judicatories to which they have voluntarily subjected themselves." If it is meant by this to support the proposition that the majority, departing from the faith, can hold the property against the minority, adhering thereto, in case of a division, the answer is that that case was one where the church was incorporated under the act of 1813, and like Petty v. Tooker, supra, was governed and controlled by that statute, and hence is no longer authority in the state of New York or elsewhere. But, if it was intended to support the proposition that the action of the judicatories of the Regular Baptist Church are absolutely binding upon the courts, then it is against the appellees, because the undisputed evidence shows that three several judicatories of that denomination had decided that appellees had departed from the faith, as expressed in the articles of faith adopted at the foundation of the church, though such decisions were only advisory.

And now, having examined all the cases cited in support of the proposition that the majority of a divided church may repudiate the original faith and hold the property, and having shown that those cases lend no support to such proposition whatever, and that there is no authority to that effect anywhere, we proceed to examine the third proposition, namely, whether the appellants, and those represented by them, ceased to have any interest in the church property by their alleged expulsion from the church. The case last referred to, together with Lawyer v. Cipperly, 7 Paige, 281, are both referred to as authority that appellants were no longer members of the church; but those cases do not lend any support to the proposition, nor to any proposition urged by counsel. The contention amounts to this: The church becoming divided into two factions on account of a difference in religious belief and faith, the majority being accused by a minority of departing from the original faith, they sit in judgment in their own case, and pass solemn judgment in their favor,—that they, being a majority, and hence the church, had a right to change the faith, and hence are not guilty of the charge. Appellees assume the position that the majority had the right to act as the judicatory for themselves, and pass solemn judgment upon their own acts, and adjudge that they are not guilty of a departure from the faith. And they condemn and exclude the minority from the church, and thus seek to preclude the civil courts from inquiring into the charge against them. And now they coolly ask this court to adjudge that their action while acting as judges in their own case shall be conclusive —not only on the opposite party, but conclusive on the courts as well—that the majority had not departed from the faith, and that the minority were out of the church, and could not raise the question of departure, and are not and were not members of the Regular Baptist Church of Mt. Tabor when the litigation begun. This, too, in the teeth of the decision of three of the church judicatories to the contrary. The language employed by the supreme court of Iowa in the case of Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore, 83 Iowa, 138, 13 L. R. A. 198, referred to in the original opinion, is so much in point here that we appropriate it: "The minority lay at the door of the majority the charge of heresy. The majority says: 'We constitute the church. All power is vested in the church, and hence in us. We determine that the charge is false.' This is the precise claim made by the appellees as to the power of a majority, and it is the precise action taken by the appellees, as a majority in Mt. Zion Baptist Church, after which the council was called, the action of which it would now repudiate. . . . The position leads to this: Consider the majority of a particular Baptist church as guilty of the grossest violations of, and the widest departure from, the church covenants and faith. Being accused by the minority, the accused sit in judgment, which it declares in its favor, and then pleads the judgment it declares as conclusive of its innocence, because no other man or body of men has authority to interfere. However such a rule may serve in purely ecclesiastical relations, we unhesitatingly say the civil law will not adhere to it, where the result is to divert trust property from its proper channel." This position of appellees at once assumes the truth of the very proposition that is in dispute, namely, the claim that the majority faction is the real and true Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church. Having assumed that as a fact, they seek to prove it by showing that such majority has excluded the minority from the church, and then argue that the appellants, being such excluded minority, cannot raise the question as to the title to the church property, elect trustees, or dispute the claim of the majority that they are the church, because appellants, being such excommunicated minority, are no longer members of the church, and have no interest in the question as to who constitutes the church, or who owns the church property. The only thing that can rescue this claim from the charge of unmitigated assumption, pure and simple, is the contention that a majority faction of a church divided into two conflicting bodies on account of differences as to the standard of faith is the real and true church. That contention, we have seen, has no foundation in law or authority. To permit such majority, under such groundless assumption, to exclude or excommunicate the minority, who still adhere to the original faith, and claim to be the church, so as to affect property rights, would be a reproach to the law. It would be the law making the title to the property turn upon a mere trick. Such action is vastly different from the action of the church in excommunicating members before it had become divided into two conflicting bodies on account of such differences in religious belief. The minority that succeeded in the Iowa case referred to above had been excluded from the church by the majority because of their difference in religious belief from the majority, and yet the claim of the minority that it constituted the real Mt. Zion Baptist Church was sustained by the supreme court of Iowa. There were three churches in Wisconsin. The denominational name by which they were known was "Koshkonong's Lutheran Congregations in Dane and Jefferson Counties." The three churchs were served by one pastor. One was known by the name of the "Eastern Church," another by the name of the "Western Church," and the other by the name of the "Liberty Prairie Church." The three churches in many things acted jointly in their business affairs. Each one of the congregations became divided on the doctrine of election. The different factions in each congregation became known as "Missourians" and "Anti-Missourians." In an action by one faction against the pastor, representing the other, for the possession of the church property, the question of the validity of the exclusion of one faction by the other (being in the majority) became involved in the case; being the case of West Koshkonong Cong. v. Ottesen, 80 Wis. 62, referred to in the original opinion. The court there said: "But it is here objected that, even if a corporation was created by these proceedings, it was simply a corporation of the anti-Missourian faction, and did not represent nor succeed to the rights of the pre-existing voluntary organization known as the 'Eastern Church'; in other words that the anti-Missourian faction had not only seceded from, but had been expelled from, the Eastern Church, and consequently could form no corporation which would include, or become the legal successor of, the voluntary organization known as the 'Eastern Church.' This objection demands careful consideration, because, if the anti Missourians were not members of the Eastern Congregation, they could not give the notice required by § 1990, Rev. Stat., nor execute the certificate required by the following section, which must be executed by members of the society. The question is, Were the members of the anti-Missourian minority still members of the Eastern Church? It is undeniably true that they were members of that church up to the time of the troubles in 1885 or 1886. Have they lost their membership since that time? Now, if they have lost their membership, it must be in one of two ways,—either by voluntary withdrawal, or by expulsion. . . . We cannot entertain for a moment the idea that the action of the Missourian faction in the Eastern Church in March, 1887, by which they attempted to declare the anti-Missourians as withdrawn or suspended from the church, has in fact affected the rights of the anti-Missourians in the least." The same legal principle, under like circumstances, is distinctly recognized in Nance v. Busby, 91 Tenn., at page 317, 15 L. R. A. 801.

This is sufficient to dispose of all the cases counsel cite in support of the proposition that civil courts are not authorized to determine whether the church judicatories decided right or wrong, and hence cannot, in this case, determine whether the minority was wrongfully or rightfully expelled from the church. They quote from Shannon v. Frost, supra, among others, the following passage: "We must take the fact of expulsion as conclusive proof that the persons expelled are not now members of the repudiating church; for, whether right or wrong, the act of excommunication must, as to the fact of membership, be law to this court. For every judicial purpose in this case, therefore, we must consider the persons who were expelled by a vote of the church as no longer members of that church, or entitled to any rights or privileges incidental to or resulting from membership therein." They cite, as sustaining this proposition, Chase v. Cheney, 58 Ill. 509, 11 Am. Rep. 95; White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends v. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, 89 Ind. 136; Lamb v. Cain, 129 Ind. 486, 14 L. R. A. 518, and Bouldin v. Alexander, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 139, 21 L. ed. 71. There is no question but that the proposition stated is thoroughly settled law. But it is equally true that, in the case from which the proposition was quoted, there was no question made, and none arose or existed in the case, as to the authority of those that performed the act or adopted the resolution or order of expulsion. It was not denied that it was done by the church. There was no division of the church on account of differences in religious belief, and there was no division on any other account. Simply the church expelled seven members, and they, uniting with others, formed a new organization, and claimed the right to use the church house a part of the time, contending that they had been wrongfully expelled, but did not deny that the church had expelled them. But here it is denied that the expulsion was by the church. We agree that no judicial inquiry can be made as to whether the act of the church in expelling members is right or wrong, fair or unfair, so long as such act is in harmony with the law of the church. Nor can any such inquiry be allowed as to whether the laws, usages, practice, or faith of the church are right or wrong. That belongs to the exclusive province of the church to fix, order, and establish. And, when the church acts within its sphere or province, such act or acts are universally held binding and conclusive, not only upon the members of the church, but also on the secular or civil courts, even where the rights of property are involved, and are dependent upon the action, rules, or orders of the church. But it must be the act of the church, and not the act of persons who are not the church. In this case it was not denied that the church had become divided into two conflicting bodies,—the minority charging that the majority had departed from the standard of faith set up at the foundation of the church,—and that both factions were claiming to be the church, and both acting accordingly, when the expulsion took place. The evidence shows that each faction thus claiming to be the church expelled the other. How absurd it is, then, to say, as counsel do in this case, that there can be no inquiry, beyond the fact of expulsion, to determine whether appellants are still members of the church!

Appellees' proposition is that appellants are not members because they have been expelled by the church. It is not sufficient to make good this claim to prove the mere act of expulsion, because that only proves one part of the claim. The other part is that the act of expulsion was done by the church, not merely by persons claiming to be the church, but by those who were really and truly the church. If the evidence falls short of proving both parts of the claim, then the evidence does not prove the claim that appellants are not members of the church. It is conceded that they were members, unless the church has expelled them. The evidence showing that there were two conflicting bodies, each made up of members of this church; and each claiming to be the only real and true Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church, and each of such bodies having expelled all the members of the other from that church, as shown by the evidence, it inevitably follows that the court must judicially investigate the question which of the two conflicting bodies is the real and true church, before it can determine that any body has been expelled therefrom, and ceased to be a member or members thereof. When such investigation results in establishing that one of these bodies is the real church, that ends the whole controversy in this case, without any inquiry about expulsions. That is so because the expulsions occurred after the division. Appellees' counsel, with tireless ingenuity, put the cart before the horse by first attempting to show that appellants were expelled, in order to reach a resting ground for the claim that appellees, and those represented by them, are the church. But no rational man can say that either of the expulsions mentioned have changed the relations of either body to the church, unless such expulsion was the act of the church. It was quite unnecessary for appellees' counsel to resort to or rely on the act of expulsion, if their other oft-repeated claim was well founded, namely, that the majority of a church divided on account of religious differences is the church. It is conceded that the church was so divided, each of the two bodies claiming to be the only true and real Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church. Both claims cannot be admitted. Hence judicial investigation must inevitably be resorted to, to ascertain which is the true church, and expulsions since the separation by either side can throw no light upon that investigation. What is the touchstone that tests which of the conflicting claimants is the true Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church? This court, in White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends v. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, in 89 Ind. 136, furnished an answer. It is there said: "The title to the property of a divided church is in that part of the organization which is acting in harmony with its own law; and the ecclesiastical laws, usages, customs, principles, and practices, which were accepted and adopted by the church before the division took place, constitute the standard for determining which of the contesting parties is in the right. Watson v. Jones, supra; McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 9; Winebrenner v. Golder, 43 Pa. 244; Schnorr's Appeal, 67 Pa. 138, 5 Am. Rep. 415; Roshi's Appeal, 69 Pa. 462, 8 Am. Rep. 275." And again, in Lamb v. Cain, 129 Ind., at page 510, 14 L. R. A. 518, this court further answered the question thus: "Where it is alleged, in a cause properly pending, that property thus dedicated is being diverted from the use intended by the donor, by teaching a doctrine different from that contemplated at the time the donation was made, however delicate and difficult it may be, it is the duty of the court to inquire whether the party accused of violating the trust is teaching a doctrine so far at variance with that intended as to defeat the objects of the trust, and, if the charge is found true, to make such orders in the premises as will secure a faithful execution of the trust confided. Watson v. Jones, supra; Miller v. Gable, 2 Denio, 492; Atty. Gen. v. Pearson, 3 Meriv. 353; Watkins v. Wilcox, 66 N. Y. 654; Atty. Gen., Abbott, v. Dublin, 38 N. H. 459; Happy v. Morton, 33 Ill. 398; Fadness v. Braunborg, 73 Wis. 257." The rule as stated by the supreme court of Illinois in Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, 31 Ill. 54, 55, and recognized by a great many decisions in courts of last resort in other states, is as follows: "As a matter of law, as I understand the decisions, the rule is that where a church is erected for the use of a particular denomination or religious persuasion, a majority of the members of the church cannot abandon the tenets and doctrine of the denomination and retain the right to the use of the property; but such secessionists forfeit all right to the property, even if but a single member adheres to the original faith and doctrine of the church. This rule is founded in reason and justice, and is not departed from in this case. Church property is rarely paid for by those alone who there worship, and those who contribute to its purchase or erection are presumed to do so with reference to a particular form of worship, or to promote the promulgation or teachings of particular doctrines or tenets of religion, which, in their estimation, tend most to the salvation of souls; and to pervert the property to another purpose is an injustice of the same character as the application of other trust property to purposes other than those designed by the donor. Hence it is that those who adhere to the original tenets and doctrines for the promulgation of which a church has been erected are the sole beneficiaries designed by the donors, and those who depart from and abandon these tenets and doctrines cease to be beneficiaries, and forfeit all claim to the title and use of such property. These are the principles on which all these decisions are founded, and, so long as we keep these principles distinctly in view, we can have no great difficulty in applying them to the facts of each particular case. . . ." The same rule was stated by the supreme court of Iowa in Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore, supra, as follows: "Upon authority so general as to be beyond question it is held that property given or set apart to a church or religious association for its use in the enjoyment and promulgation of its adopted faith and teachings is by said church or association held in trust for that purpose, and any member of the church or association less than the whole, may not divert it therefrom." Accordingly, it was said by Sharswood, J., speaking for the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Schnorr's Appeal, 67 Pa. 138, 5 Am. Rep. 415, cited in the original opinion, that, "in church organizations those who adhere and submit to the regular order of the church, . . . though a minority, are the true congregation and corporation, if incorporated." Chief Justice Shaw, speaking for the supreme court of Massachusetts in a similar case (Stebbins v. Jennings, 10 Pick., at page 181), said: "That an adhering minority of a local or territorial parish, and not a seceding majority, constitutes the church of such parish, to all civil purposes, was fully settled in the case of Baker v. Fales, 16 Mass. 503, and Deacons of First Church of Sandwich v. Tilden, Id. note, there cited." To the same effect is Roshi's Appeal, supra, and many other cases too numerous to cite. Therefore it follows that if the minority were acting in harmony with the ecclesiastical laws of the church, and were adhering to the faith, and the majority were not, the minority, in law, was the real and true Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church. In one of the very cases relied upon by appellee's counsel (Bouldin v. Alexander, 82 U. S. 15 Wall., at pages 139, 140, 21 L. ed. 71, 72), the Supreme Court of the United States said: "It may be conceded that we have no power to revise or question ordinary acts of church discipline, or excision from membership. We have only to do with rights of property. As was said in Shannon v. Frost, 3 B. Mon. 253, we cannot decide who ought to be members of the church, nor whether the excommunicated have been regularly or irregularly cut off. We must take the fact of excommunication as conclusive proof that the persons exscinded are not members. But we may inquire whether the resolution of expulsion was the act of the church, or of persons who were not the church, and who consequently had no right to excommunicate others."

It follows, as conclusively as that two and two make four, that appellants, and those acting with them, did not cease to be members of the church by the act of the majority in expelling them, if we were right, in the original opinion, in holding that such majority had departed from the chosen faith declared in the articles of faith adopted at the foundation of the church, and were teaching doctrines contrary thereto, because the unbroken line of judicial authority everywhere, as we have seen, declares the law to be, in such case, that such majority were not the real and true Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church, and could not expel anybody from it, but that the minority, represented by the appellants, were that church, because they were acting, as we there held, in accordance with the law of the church, in adhering to the faith, and teaching the doctrines expressed in such articles of faith.

This brings us, in the natural order, to the first proposition on which a rehearing is asked, namely, that our former conclusion that the evidence shows such departure from the faith by the appellees, and those represented by them, the majority, is based on an incorrect statement of the facts established by the evidence. The conflicting doctrines held by the two bodies are known as the "means doctrine," held to by the majority, and the "anti-means doctrine," held to by the minority. The epitome of the two doctrines may be stated thus: The "anti-means" doctrine is a belief and faith that conversions of sinners to Christianity, and the salvation of human souls, is not, and cannot be, brought about or aided by any human means or effort whatever, but that the same must be, and is, wholly and entirely the work of the Lord. The "means doctrine" is a belief and faith in the exact opposite,—that such conversions and salvation may be aided by the use of human means. There is no controversy about the meaning of the two terms, "means" and "anti-means," nor as to the conflicting beliefs, as above expressed; but the strange charge is now made that the "anti-means" party are the ones that have departed from the faith, and that the "means doctrine" was the original doctrine of the church. And, out of the vast volume of about 600 pages of evidence, appellees' learned counsel are only able to point to these lines in evidence, as establishing that fact, in the testimony of Elder Shirley, to wit: "It [Mt. Tabor Church] has always been 'means' since my knowledge of it. So far as I know of its church history, it has been 'means' since the beginning of its constitution." Counsel say of this evidence that "on the other hand, the appellants did not introduce a single witness to contradict the testimony of Elder Shirley on that proposition, or prove that Mt. Tabor Church was, or ever had been, 'anti-means,' in its doctrines or teachings, and not a single witness so testified. In the evidence of all the witnesses examined during the protracted trial of this case, there was not a word from any one of them to sustain the assumption on which this opinion is predicated,—that the 'means' party had departed from the faith on which Mt. Tabor Church was constituted." This sweeping and startling declaration is made in defiance of, and by ignoring, the conclusive documentary and other evidence adduced. It treats the articles of faith put in evidence as having no force, and it ignores the evidence of the solemn decisions of two councils of the churches, and the decision of the Danville Association, that the majority or 'means' party had departed from the faith, as expressed in the articles of faith, and that the "anti-means" party, the minority, were still adhering to that faith, and were the real and true and only Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church. It is true, the decisions of these three ecclesiastical tribunals, recognized judicatories of that church, were not conclusive on the parties, according to the governmental policy of the church, but advisory only; but nevertheless, as was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Bouldin v. Alexander, supra, such decisions "are persuasive evidence" of the facts thus decided. And here, we notice, counsel urged that appellants relied hitherto on the theory that the decision of the Danville Association was conclusive evidence of such departure; and we having decided that it was not conclusive, but advisory only, appellants, it is contended, must succeed on that theory, or fail. The theory on which the appeal was sought to be maintained is that the finding was contrary to law, in that it was contrary to the evidence. Appellants' contention that the decision of the Danville Association was conclusive evidence of the charge of departure was not inconsistent with the specification in the motion for a new trial that the finding was contrary to the law and the evidence in the case. It was not essential to that theory that the evidence, or one item of it, should be conclusive against appellees; but it was a sufficient maintenance thereof that the finding was contrary to the evidence, without showing that any particular item of it was conclusive of the fact it tended to prove. Two of the articles of faith read thus: "Fourth. We believe in the election by grace according as He has chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him, in love, having predestinated us to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ, to crown us according to the good pleasure of His will. Fifth. We believe that sinners are justified by the righteousness of God which is in Christ Jesus imputed to them by divine and supernatural operation of the spirit of God, and that they are kept by the power of God through unto salvation." In all this long controversy, it has never been hinted by a single witness that this declaration of faith was consistent with the "means" doctrine; nor have counsel for appellees, in all their long and earnest argument, either on the original hearing or on this petition for rehearing, claimed that the decisions by the three several judicatories of the church had wrongly construed the articles of faith to be in conflict with the "means doctrine." Nor is there a scintilla of evidence that there was ever but the one construction put upon this declaration of faith. What, then, was this long protracted hearing of evidence about,—occupying about ten days,—if the item of evidence we have quoted was uncontradicted? Why, it was all, except that item, devoted to an effort on the part of appellees to prove that the majority in a church with a congregational form of government, as here, could change at pleasure their standard of faith. Hence it was that the discussion of the item of evidence in question in appellees' original brief occupied only two lines, and in the present brief, of over sixty pages, only a little over a page is devoted to this item of evidence. The whole evidence proceeded on the theory of a conceded departure in faith by the majority, and an attempted justification thereof on the ground that the majority had the right to change or alter the faith and doctrine of the church, unless the item of evidence in question can be construed as a denial of such departure by the majority. That theory still occupies all of appellees' elaborate brief, except a page or two. But there is still another item of evidence, of a very vital and controlling character, that counsel ignore; and that is that the church record put in evidence shows that when the church was organized it was named a "Regular Baptist Church," and its denominational name has never been changed. No principle is better settled than that property conveyed to trustees for the use of a church by its denominational name, as was the case here, creates a trust for the promulgation of the tenets and doctrines of that denomination. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 16 Am. Rep. 82; Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, Kniskern v. Lutheran Churches, First Reformed Presby. Church v. Bowden, and Miller v. Gable, supra. History records that one of the denominations or sects known as the "Baptists" is what is known and called "Regular Baptists." History says that they are strongly Calvinistic in doctrine. 1 American Church History, p. 19. A summary of their articles of faith by the same history is stated as follows: "Articles 1 and 2 state the doctrine of the Trinity and accept the Old and New Testament as the Word of God and only rule of faith and practice. Article 3 declares that God chose his people in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world, 'and predestinated them unto the adoption of children;' article 4, that man is a sinner, and consequently in a lost condition; article 5, that he has no power, of his own free will, and ability to recover himself from his fallen state; article 6, that sinners are justified in the sight of God only by the righteousness of Jesus Christ; article 7, that the elect are 'called and regenerated by the Holy Spirit, through the Gospel;' article 8, that nothing can separate true believers from the love of God and that they shall be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." Id. (1893) p. 21. This is Calvinistic doctrine, and corresponds exactly to the doctrine designated in the evidence as "anti-means doctrine." Tylor, Ecclesiastical Law, §§ 830, 831. The doctrine designated in the evidence as the "means doctrine" corresponds exactly to what is known as "Arminian doctrine." Ibid. These two doctrines, in the light of historical facts of which courts take notice, are recognized as in irreconcilable conflict in Miller v. Gable, supra.

But there is another item of vital and controlling evidence which counsel ignore. It is evidence which shows that appellees, and the majority acting with and represented by them, construed the articles of faith and the denominational tenets of the Regular Baptist Church to be in conflict with the "means doctrine" just as the two councils and the association had. After a two years struggle by the contending factions seeking recognition and admission to the Danville Association, to which the church belonged, and each claiming that it was the only true Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church, the majority party was disowned and refused admittance because of such departure from the faith and the minority party received and recognized as the church. The majority party went home and organized a new association, and after grave deliberation they named it the "Mount Tabor Means Baptist Association." Thus it will be seen that the denominational name of "Regular Baptist" was changed by dropping out the word "Regular," which distinguishes that denomination of Baptists in the United States from twelve or thirteen other denominations of Baptists, and in the place of the word "Regular" they substituted the word "Means." 1 American Church History, p. 18. There is no such church known to history as "Means Baptists." If the church was and always had been a "means" church,—if the denominational faith and belief was in the "means" doctrine,—then the denominational name of "Regular Baptists" carried that idea with it, and there was no cause for changing it. As was said in Hale v. Everett, supra: "A society which should take for its name 'The First Society of Roman Catholics in C,' or 'The First Society of Presbyterians in C,' or 'The First Society of Quakers in C,' would be understood as made up of persons of the sect which the name of the society indicated; and if a donation of a church had been made to certain persons, . . . to be forever subject to the control of the First Society of Roman Catholics in C, . . . the trust would have been held to be subject to the control of such of the society, and such only, as adhered to the fundamental doctrines of the society as indicated by the name, even though they might be a minority of those who at first were numbered among its members." By dropping out the very word, and the only word, from the denominational name that distinguished the denomination from twelve or thirteen other sects of Baptists, and substituting in its place the word "Means," about which the whole trouble had arisen, is an act that as plainly construes the articles of faith and the tenets of the denomination to be in conflict with the "means" doctrine as any act could be on the part of the majority. If the "means" doctrine was taught in the articles of faith,—if it belongs to the tenets of the denomination—the majority would have refused, to the last, to change the name. This change was a frank confession on the part of the majority at a time, perhaps, when the uppermost thought in their minds was to express their belief that the denominational name, "Regular Baptist Church," did not carry with it a correct expression of their religious faith and belief, and that the articles of faith did not do so. And the act of the minority in adhering to the old name is equally significant. Thus it is that the majority, represented by the appellees, have, by an unequivocal act, placed the same construction upon the articles of faith and the tenets of the denomination that the minority, the two councils, and the association have, in deciding that the "means" doctrine is a departure from the faith as expressed in the articles of faith. And the civil courts accept the construction placed upon the ecclesiastical laws of an ecclesiastical body by such body as binding on the civil courts. Lamb v. Cain, White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends v. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, and Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore, supra. Here both the conflicting bodies, as well as the ecclesiastical court of the denomination, have so construed the articles of faith and the denominational tenets as to hold, impliedly at least, that the "means" doctrine is a departure therefrom. That construction is binding on this court. The articles of faith, being a solemn written compact, are conclusive on the question of faith. If the item of testimony quoted from Elder Shirley was in conflict with the articles of faith, thus construed, his testimony being oral only, it cannot be considered in opposition to the written compact. Robinson v. Snyder, 97 Ind. 60, 61; Oiler v. Bodkey, 17 Ind. 602; Symmes v. Brown, 13 Ind. 320–322. But aside from that, his testimony, when examined, may be harmonized with all the other evidence, which it is the duty of the court or jury to do, if that can be reasonably done. He was speaking from his standpoint. He and all the witnesses on that side were testifying that the majority constituted the church,—as the learned counsel have, in the brief on this petition, repeated nearly fifty times, that the majority is the church, and the church is the majority. He said, "So far as I know of its church history, it has been 'means' since the beginning, in its constitution;" that is, according to all the witnesses on that side the majority is the church. Therefore he means that the majority, so far as he knows, believes in the "means" doctrine. That fact was not denied. How it was at the constitution of the church, he does not state. What did he know? He was speaking more than fifty years after the church was founded, and only spoke so far as he knew. He testified that he was but a boy in 1859, which was twenty-four years after the church was founded. He did not profess to know what the original faith was on which the church was constituted. Such testimony, it has been held, affords no information as to what the original faith was on which the church was founded, and the faith at that time is the vital and turning point. Kniskern v. Lutheran Churches, and Roshi's Appeal, supra. So that there is really no conflict between the item of testimony in question and the articles of faith, and other evidence as to what the original faith of the church was; but, if there was such conflict, the solemn written compact must be held conclusive.

The fourth and last proposition made is that appellants were not legally elected trustees by the minority, because there was no vacancy in such offices, and that a minority could not elect, and hence appellants could not maintain this suit. In Schnorr's Appeal, supra, Sharswood, J., speaking for the court, said: "The corporation or society are trustees, and can no more divert the property from the use to which it was originally dedicated, than any other trustees can. If they should undertake to divert the funds, equity will raise some other trustee to administer them, and apply them according to the intention of the original donors or subscribers." That was a case where both factions, as here, had elected trustees. To the same effect are several of the cases cited in this and the original opinion. But there is another, and perhaps a more conclusive, reason why the legality of the election of the appellees in this case is not to be considered; and that is that there was no issue under which the authority of the appellants, as trustees, to sue, could be inquired into. The complaint shows on its face that appellants sued in their capacity as trustees of Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church. The only answer to the complaint reads thus: "The defendants in the above case, for answer, say that the said Albert Smith, Samuel Schenck, and Thomas Shepherd are not the trustees of the Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church, and were not at the time of the commencement of this action; that the defendants Robert G. Pedigo, Preston Smith, and Levi Shirley are the trustees of said church and corporation, and were so at the time of the commencement of this suit; and the said defendants deny each and every allegation in said complaint contained. Wherefore they demand judgment for costs and all proper relief." This answer was verified. But it was a palpable attempt to defeat the merits by dilatory matter in abatement that has nothing to do with the merits, by commingling them together. They sought to try the merits under cover of matter in abatement, and, failing in their defense on the merits, fall back on the matter in abatement, and insist, not on abating the suit, but on a finding and judgment in their favor on the merits. The common law would not permit this to be done, and for a long time our Code was construed not to have changed the common law in this respect, but it was afterwards construed to have modified the common law so as to allow matter in abatement and in bar to be pleaded together in the same answer. But immediately thereafter the legislature enacted the following: "Pleadings denying the jurisdiction of the court, or in abatement of the action, and all dilatory pleadings, must be supported by affidavit. The character or capacity in which a party sues or is sued and the authority by virtue of which he sues, shall require no proof on the trial of the cause, unless such character, capacity, or authority be denied by a pleading under oath, or affidavit filed therewith. An answer in abatement must precede, and cannot be pleaded with, an answer in bar, and the issue thereon must be tried first and separately. If the issue be found against the answer, the judgment must be that the party plead over, and for all costs of the action up to that time." Rev. Stat. 1894, § 368 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 365). It was held before the enactment of this statute that the authority of a party to sue could only be put in issue by a plea in abatement verified. Nolte v. Libbert, 34 Ind. 163. It has also been held by this court that at common law, as well as under this provision of the Code, matter in abatement must precede, and cannot be pleaded with, matter in bar. Field v. Malone, 102 Ind. 251; Driggins v. Clark, 94 Ind. 49, 48 Am. Rep. 140; Moore v. Harmon, 142 Ind. 555. It was frequently held, prior to the enactment of the provision of the Code above quoted, that a plea in abatement along with one in bar is a waiver of the matter in abatement, and that such matter in abatement cannot be considered by the court. Kenyon v. Williams, 19 Ind. 46, 47; Jones v. Cincinnati Type Foundry Co. 14 Ind. 90 92; Keller v. Miller, 17 Ind. 207. And since that enactment the same rule was applied in Field v. Malone, 102 Ind., at pages 256, 257, where this court said: "The appellee insists that the plea in abatement, having been filed with the general denial, and forming the second paragraph of the same answer, cannot be considered. . . . And this unquestionably was the rule under the common law, and is the rule under the present Code." The answer here did not ask to abate the action, but asked judgment on the merits for the defendants. Therefore, under the statute and the previous decisions of this court, the matter in abatement was waived, thus making it wholly unnecessary to prove the character or capacity in which appellants sued.

Howard, J., dissenting:

With the greater part of the original opinion in this case, as well as of the principal opinion on the petition for a rehearing, I fully concur. There can be no question that those who retain the original faith of a church or congregation are entitled to retain also the property acquired by, or given to, such church or congregation. Those who fall away from the original faith, whether the majority or the minority, can have no right to take with them any of the property of the church. The property having been given to the church, or acquired by it, for the purpose of sustaining or spreading the belief and practice in its doctrines, it would be manifestly inequitable that members afterwards rejecting the faith should have any part in the property used in disseminating the same faith. I am of opinion, however, that there was evidence in this case quite sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court, and, this being the case, that we have no right to disturb the judgment so rendered. The evidence, as I read it, and even the original articles of faith and practice, and the code of rules adopted by the church on its organization, sustain the finding that Mt. Tabor Regular Baptist Church taught from the beginning the faith now professed by the appellees,—that it was a "means" church from its foundation. The decisions of the various councils and of the Danville Association are all confessedly but evidence of what was the original belief of the church. But, besides this evidence, there was ample evidence, also, given by many learned teachers and doctors of the Baptist Church, going to show that the Mt. Tabor Church was always a "means," and not an "anti-means," church; in other words, as its articles of belief and rules of decorum seem to show, that while the church believed in election by grace, and justification by the righteousness of God, yet it also believed that they that have done good shall rise to eternal life, and that they that have done evil shall descend to eternal damnation, and that men may be brought to God by human means, God so making use of the instrumentality of man. Much evidence was also given to show that by the original constitution of this church the form of government is that the majority vote is the voice of the church, even in articles of faith; that each church must put its own construction upon the Scriptures; and that this must be done by a majority vote. There is no appeal to any other authority. The local church is supreme. The record further shows that, as a matter of fact, the "anti-means" minority was not expelled for any belief, or want of belief, but "for disorderly conduct, in declaring an unfellowship for a portion of the members of Mt. Tabor Church." The evidence here referred to was believed by the trial court, who therefore found that the "means" majority were the true Mt. Tabor Church, and rightfully entitled to the church property. I am at a loss consequently, to know how we can, consistently with the rules of this court, disregard the finding so made, and reverse the judgment based upon it. For the reasons here given, I must dissent from the conclusion reached by the majority of my brethren.

1. Marriage with her seducer extinguishes the right of action for damages for seduction, which is given by Rev. Stat. 1881, § 263 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 264), to any unmarried woman, and she cannot maintain an action against him therefor after a divorce.
2. A marriage procured by fraud is voidable at the suit of the injured party independent of any provisions of the divorce law.
3. A merely formal marriage entered into without intent to perform the marriage vows, but only to avoid imprisonment for bastardy and prosecution for seduction, and which is followed by a desertion of the wife, may be declared void by a judicial decree at the instance of the wife.
4. A decree of the nullity of a marriage between a woman and her seducer establishes her right to sue him for her seduction under the Indiana statute, notwithstanding the form of marriage between them, which, if it were valid, would have defeated the action.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Allen County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for seduction. Reversed.

NOTE.—The above case is not only a novel one in respect to the nature of the cause of action which is given by statute, but it very sharply distinguishes between the effect of a divorce and an annulment of marriage.

For jurisdiction of chancery to decree nullity or dissolution of marriage, see note to Ridgely v. Ridgely (Md.) 25 L. R. A. 800.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel M. Hench for appellant.

Messrs. Randall & Doughman for appellee.

Monks, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant brought this action against appellee to recover damages for her own seduction, under the provisions of § 263, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 264). Appellee's separate demurrer to each paragraph of the amended complaint for want of facts was sustained. Appellant refused to plead further, and judgment was rendered against her. This action of the court is assigned as error. It is urged by appellee that the specifications in the assignment of errors are not directed to the ruling on each paragraph, but to the complaint as an entirety. While the specifications in the assignment are not as certain as they could have been made, yet we think they call in question the ruling of the court upon each paragraph of the complaint. The question presented by the demurrer to the first and second paragraphs of the complaint is whether a woman under the age of twenty-one years, who has been seduced, and marries her seducer, and afterwards procures a divorce, has, after said divorce is granted, a cause of action against him for damages for said seduction, under the provisions of § 263, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 264). Section 263, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 264), provides that "any unmarried female may prosecute as plaintiff an action for her own seduction and may recover therein such damages as may be assessed in her favor." It was held by this court in Dowling v. Crapo, 65 Ind. 209, that an action for the seduction of an unmarried female was not barred by her subsequent marriage to a person other than her seducer; that the term "unmarried," used in the statute, relates to the time of the seduction, and not to the time of the commencement or trial of the action. At common law a valid marriage made the husband and wife one person in law. The legal existence of the woman was suspended, or merged in that of the husband. 1 Bl. Com. 442, 443; Co. Litt. 112*b*; 2 Kent, Com. p. 129; Schouler, Husb. & W. § 6. The husband, by virtue of the marriage, was entitled to all the personal property and choses in action of his wife, which when reduced to possession, became his absolute property, and was also entitled to the exclusive possession, use, and control of her real estate during their joint lives. The marriage extinguished all debts and causes of action for antenuptial wrongs between the parties. Long v. Kinney, 49 Ind. 235; Flenner v. Flenner, 29 Ind. 564; Burleigh v. Coffin, 22 N. For the reason that the marriage extinguished antenuptial rights of action for tort or upon contract, between husband and wife, the wife could not, after divorce from her husband, or his death, maintain an action against him or his estate for any injury to her person or character committed by him before their marriage, or during coverture. Peters v. Peters, Abbott v. Abbott, and Libby v. Berry, supra; Main v. Main, 46 Ill. App. 106; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 795, and notes 9, 10; Schouler, Husb. & W. § 81. These rules of the common law are founded upon the principle that the husband and wife are one in law, and not upon the theory that the wife is under a legal disability. Barnett v. Harshbarger, 105 Ind. 410; Phillips v. Barnet, supra.

The rules of the common law have been greatly relaxed in this state by legislative enactment. It is provided by § 5116, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 6961), enacted in 1852, that "no lands of any married woman shall be liable for the debts of her husband, but such lands and the profits therefrom shall be her separate property as fully as if she were unmarried; provided, that such wife shall have no power to encumber or convey such lands except by deed in which her husband shall join." Section 2488, Rev. Stat. 1881, enacted in 1853, provides that "the personal property of the wife held by her at the time of her marriage or acquired during coverture by descent, devise, or gift shall remain her own property to the same extent and under the same rules as her real estate so remains, and on the death of the husband before the wife such personal property shall go to the wife, and on the death of the wife before the husband shall be distributed in the same manner as her real estate descends and is apportioned under the same circumstances." This section was amended in 1891 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2649), but the provision concerning personal property owned by the wife at the time of her marriage remains unchanged. Section 254, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 255), provides that "a married woman may sue alone: First. When the action concerns her separate property. Second. When the action is between herself and her husband; but in no case shall she be required to sue or defend by guardian or next friend except she be under the age of twenty-one years." Under this section it is clear that a married woman may, as sole plaintiff, sue her husband, or any other person, concerning her separate property. Adams v. Sater, 19 Ind. 418; Gee v. Lewis, 20 Ind. 149; Mills v. Winter, 94 Ind. 329. The effect of § 254, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 255), was to leave the common-law rule in force, except as to the cases mentioned in said section in which the wife was authorized to sue alone. Hamm v. Romine, 98 Ind. 77, 80. This court held that said § 254, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 255), did not change the common-law rule that, in all actions to recover injuries to the person or character of a married woman, the husband and wife must join as plaintiff. Barnett v. Leonard, Rogers v. Smith, and Long v. Morrison, supra. Section 5131, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 6976), which was first enacted in 1879, provides that "a married woman may bring and maintain an action in her own name against any person or body corporate for damages for any injury to her person or character the same as if she were sole; and the money recovered shall be her separate property, and her husband in such case shall not be liable for costs." While the statutes in this state have removed the disabilities of married women, until ability is now the rule and disability the exception, yet all her disabilities have not been removed. Barnett v. Harshbarger, 105 Ind. 410; Rosa v. Prather, 103 Ind. 191. As we have shown, the common law rule that marriage extinguished all rights of action in favor of the wife against the husband, for antenuptial injuries by the husband to her person or character, was founded upon the principle of the unity of husband and wife, and not upon the theory that the wife was under a legal disability. This rule of the common law is in force in this state, unless it has been changed by statute. This court has held that the same has not been abrogated. In speaking of this rule of the common law in Barnett v. Harshbarger, on page 413, 105 Ind., this court said: "Our decisions declare that it has not been abrogated. In the carefully considered case of Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 102, it is affirmed that the general rule of the common law respecting the unity of husband and wife has not been overthrown. The decision in Mathes v. Shank, 94 Ind. 501, recognizes the rule of the common law, and affirms that it exists except as changed or modified by statute. The doctrine of the supreme court of Massachusetts, declared in Lord v. Parker, 3 Allen, 127, was adopted in Haas v. Shaw, 91 Ind. 384, 46 Am. Rep. 607." And this court quoted with approval from Lord v. Parker, supra, the following observations upon the effect of the enabling statute: "They are in derogation of the common law, and certainly are not to be extended by construction. . . . It is for the legislature, and not for the courts, to destroy the rule of the common law declaring the unity of husband and wife. . . . The unity which a settled rule of law has recognized through so many years cannot be disregarded, and it prevents the operation of the general statutes removing the disabilities of married women. . . . The question is not whether disabilities have been removed, but whether the long-prevailing rule of the law, declaring husband and wife to be one person, in legal contemplation, has been annulled." The same doctrine is declared in Grant v. Green, 41 Iowa, 88; Mewhirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618; Peters v. Peters, supra. Until this rule is annulled, all rights of action for antenuptial wrongs of the husband to the wife are extinguished by their marriage. Statutes relating to the estate or property of the husband and wife do not affect their personal relations. They only change the status and rights of the husband so far as may be necessary to secure to the wife the enjoyment of the rights conferred by such statutes. Section 254, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 255), authorizes a wife to sue alone where the cause of action relates to her separate property, and under said section she may sue her husband, or any other person or persons, concerning such property. Wilkins v. Miller, 9 Ind. 100; Scott v. Scott, 13 Ind. 225; Flenner v. Flenner, 29 Ind. 564. Said section changes the procedure, but confers no new right on the wife, and does not, therefore, entitle her to sue her husband for a personal injury to herself, committed by him either before or after their marriage, for the reason that whether a husband is liable to his wife therefor is not a mere question of procedure, but of substantial right. Peters v. Peters, Libby v. Berry, Abbott v. Abbott, Phillips v. Barnet, Mewhirter v. Hatten, and Grant v. Green, supra. It is clear that § 5131, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 6976), authorizing the wife to bring and maintain an action in her own name for any injury to her person or character, the same as if she were sole, merely changes the procedure but gives no new right, and only applies to such causes of actions as could only be maintained by the husband and wife as coplaintiffs before said section took effect. The wife could not, therefore, maintain an action in her own name, under this section, against her husband, for any injury to her person or character. Besides, the section provides that the husband in such case shall not be liable for costs; and this, in express terms, indicates that the wife cannot maintain an action in her own name against her husband, under said section. In 1860 the legislature of New York passed an act (Laws 1860, chap. 60, p. 158), by § 7 of which it was provided: "Any married woman may bring and maintain an action in her own name for damages against any person or body corporate for any injury to her person or character the same as if she were sole, and the money received upon settlement of any such judgment shall be her sole and separate property." This section was amended by an act passed in 1862 (Laws 1862, chap. 172), but not in respect to the wife's right to bring an action as provided in the act of 1860. It was held in Freethy v. Freethy, 42 Barb. 641, that a wife could not maintain an action against her husband to recover damages for slander uttered by him; and it was declared that the legislature did not intend by the laws of 1860 and 1862, to which reference has been made, to change the common-law rule as to the unity of husband and wife. In Longendyke v. Longendyke, 44 Barb. 366, it was held, under the same section, that the wife could not maintain an action against her husband for an assault and battery. In Schultz v. Schultz, 89 N. Y. 644, the court of appeals followed the foregoing cases, and held that the wife could not maintain an action against her husband to recover damages for assault and battery. Section 7 of the Acts of 1860 and 1862, of New York, was more comprehensive than § 5131, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 6976), because it did not exclude the right of the wife to sue the husband, by providing that he should not be liable for costs.

It is evident from what we have said, and the authorities cited, that appellant's right of action against appellee for her seduction was extinguished by their marriage, and that she could not maintain an action against him therefor after her divorce. To the same effect are the cases of Peters v. Peters, Libby v. Berry, Abbott v. Abbott, Mewhirter v. Hatten, and Grant v. Green, supra. But counsel for appellant insists "that she obtained the divorce from appellant on the ground that the marriage on the part of the appellee was fraudulent, and that she has a cause of action after said divorce, against him, for her seduction." It is true that it is alleged in the first and second paragraphs of the complaint that appellee fraudulently married appellant to avoid imprisonment, and that he did not intend to live or cohabit with her as a husband, or to keep his marriage vows, but to desert her, and that he did, immediately after said marriage, leave, abandon, and desert her, and never lived or cohabited with her after said marriage, and refused to support appellant, although he was able to do so; but it is not alleged that the divorce was granted on this ground. Without such an averment, it must be presumed that the word "divorce" was used in its ordinary sense, and that such divorce was granted appellant for some statutory cause. Miller v. Miller, 33 Cal. 353. If, however, it was alleged in said paragraphs that the divorce was granted to appellant on the part of appellee on account of the alleged fraud on the part of appellee, it would be equivalent to an allegation that the court had granted appellant a decree of nullity, and adjudged that said marriage was void. Substance, not names or form, controls in determining the meaning, character, and effect of a pleading, or the judgment or decree of a court. Fraud is not a cause of divorce, but a marriage voidable on the ground of fraud may be adjudged void by a court of competent jurisdiction. While the term "divorce" is not properly applicable to a decree of nullity, yet such a decree is often called a "divorce." 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 532; 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. (ed. 1881) § 166. In 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. (ed. 1891), it is said: "Not infrequently the judicial declaration of nullity is called a 'divorce.' It is properly so where the marriage it declares void was only voidable. For example, it is common and correct language to speak of impotency as a cause for divorce. And Blackstone writes that 'divorce a vinculo matrimonii must be for some of the canonical causes of impediment. But the expression 'sentence' or 'decree of nullity' equally will indicate the legal avoidance of a voidable marriage; and it seems more significant, and less liable to be misunderstood, than the other, and somewhat better in accord with modern usage." The question presented by the demurrer to the third paragraph of the amended complaint is whether a woman who has been seduced and marries her seducer, and the court afterwards, on her application, adjudges that said marriage was void, can, after such decree, bring and maintain an action against him for said seduction, under § 263, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 264). An action for divorce is brought for the purpose of dissolving a marriage, while a nullity suit is brought for the purpose of having a void marriage declared void, or a voidable marriage judicially made void. In the divorce suit the marriage is recognized as valid, and adjudged to be dissolved from the date of the decree; but in the nullity suit the marriage is not recognized, but is adjudged void,—that is, that there was no marriage,—and the rights of the parties are the same as if the marriage had never taken place. 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. (ed. 1891) §§ 259, 271. It follows that the rule established in this state, that all property questions between husband and wife are presumed to be adjudicated in the decree of divorce, does not apply to a decree of nullity, and can therefore have no application to this case. A marriage which is procured by fraud is voidable at the suit of the injured party, and may be declared void by judicial decree. The courts have jurisdiction of such actions, independently of any provision of the divorce law. Bishop v. Redmond, 83 Ind. 157; Tefft v. Tefft, 35 Ind. 44, 50, and cases cited; Mason v. Mason, 101 Ind. 25, 28; Clark v. Field, 13 Vt. 460, 472; Le Barron v. Le Barron, 2 Am. (ed. 1891) §§ 471–473, 476, notes 1 and 2; Id. §§ 477, 543, 544; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 206; 2 Kent, Com. 767; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 35.

In England the power to annul marriages was exercised by the ecclesiastical courts, and the principles and practice concerning such jurisdiction constituted a part of the common law of that country, and was therefore adopted as the law of this state by statute. Section 236, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 236); Tefft v. Tefft, supra. Courts having the jurisdiction of courts of equity, under the general power to annul fraudulent contracts, have also jurisdiction to annul a marriage on account of fraud. Clark v. Field, supra; Keyes v. Keyes, 22 N. H. 553; Burtis v. Burtis, Hopk. Ch. 557, 14 Am. Dec. 563; Wightman v. Wightman, 4 Johns. Ch. 343; Carris v. Carris, supra. In Bishop v. Redmond, supra, appellee charged in her complaint that Redmond, one of the appellants, married her in the evening, and abandoned her the next morning; that prior to the marriage he seduced her, and that she was the mother of a bastard child begotten by him; that after he had seduced her he conceived the fraudulent scheme of cheating her by marrying and abandoning her, and by conveying before marriage all of his property; that Jacob Bishop, his co-appellant, conspired with him in this fraudulent design, and, for the purpose of aiding in carrying it into effect, received a conveyance of land from him; that the conveyance was without consideration, and was made to and received by Bishop for the sole purpose of giving effect to the fraudulent scheme to defraud appellee. Prayer that a divorce be granted, alimony awarded, and the fraudulent conveyance set aside. This complaint did not state any statutory cause for a divorce, but did state facts sufficient to entitle appellee to a decree of nullity on the ground of fraud. It was only upon this theory that the action of the trial court could be sustained. The difference between that action and the one at bar is that in that action the injured party sought and obtained the decree of nullity and damages (incorrectly called "alimony" in the complaint and the decree of the trial court) in the same action, while in this the decree of nullity was first procured, and the action for damages brought afterwards. It was shown by the evidence in that case that Elijah Redmond had carnal knowledge of appellee in June, 1879; that while appellee was pregnant with child by said Redmond, he conveyed the real estate described in the complaint to his co-appellant, Bishop, in November, 1879; that the bastard child was born in March, 1880, and appellee was married to Redmond, the father of said child, in November, 1880; and that the allegations of the complaint heretofore set out were true. The court below rendered a decree of nullity in favor of appellee, calling it as is often done, a "divorce," and a judgment for damages against her seducer, and a decree setting aside the conveyance of the real estate to Bishop, and that the same be sold, which was affirmed by this court on appeal. The court in that case held that where a conspiracy is formed for the purpose of defeating the claim of a woman for her seduction, in which a fraudulent purpose to marry and then abandon her enters into and forms a part thereof, the claim for damages for the seduction is not defeated by the marriage entered into for the purpose of carrying such scheme into execution. The court said: "The eleventh instruction given by the court was correct. It informed the jury that if the evidence satisfied them that the conveyance was made to and accepted by Bishop for the purpose of defrauding the appellee out of any judgment that might be obtained against his grantor, they might find the conveyance to be fraudulent. As we have seen, in examining the complaint, the appellee was a creditor from the time (June, 1879) the right to legal redress accrued in her favor, and if the conveyance was made for the fraudulent purpose of preventing the collection of a judgment rendered in vindication of that right, she was entitled to have it set aside. It is argued that the evidence shows a marriage, and that this had the effect of canceling the prior right, and that, therefore, the rule declared in the instruction is not applicable. There was, however, evidence fully justifying the inference that the marriage was, as the complaint charges, one of the steps in the fraudulent scheme to defeat the claim of the appellee, and was contracted solely for the purpose of carrying it into effect. If the marriage was entered into for this corrupt purpose, and there was an abandonment of the appellee pursuant to the preconceived design to defraud her, it did not defeat the claim for damages for the original wrong." What was the original wrong? The seduction of appellee by Redmond, one of the appellants. Of course, the right of appellee to recover damages against Redmond, and set aside the conveyance to Bishop, depended upon whether a decree of nullity (called a "divorce" in the complaint and decree) was granted to him. If appellee in the case at bar, as alleged, did not intend to live and cohabit with appellant, or have any sort of marital intercourse with her, when the marriage ceremony was performed, but merely went through the formalities to avoid imprisonment for bastardy and prosecution for seduction, and immediately left, and did not perform his marriage vows, the marriage was voidable, at the election of appellant, upon the discovery of such fraud; and she was entitled to bring an action against appellee, and have the same declared void by judicial decree. Bishop v. Redmond, supra, and authorities cited above; 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. (ed. 1891) §§ 473, 476, note 2; Id. §§ 327–339, 477. After such decree had been rendered, she had the right to sue appellee for her seduction, the same as if she had never been married to him.

It also appears from the allegations in the third paragraph of the amended complaint that appellant was, when married to appellee, under the age of sixteen years, and was therefore incapable, on that account, of contracting such marriage with appellee. Section 5324, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 7289). It is provided by § 1025, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 1037), that when either of the parties to a marriage shall be incapable, from want of age, of contracting such marriage, the same may be declared void, on application of the incapable party, by any court having jurisdiction to decree divorces. It is clear that appellee was also entitled to have her marriage to appellant annulled on this ground, unless she ratified said marriage after she arrived at the age of sixteen years. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 487–489. Shafher v. State, 20 Ohio, 1; McDowell v. Sapp, 39 Ohio St. 558; Holtz v. Dick, 42 Ohio St. 23, 51 Am. Rep. 791; Stewart, Mar. & Div. §§ 57, 58. It is the policy of the law, in this state, however, that children born or begotten during the existence of a voidable marriage are considered legitimate, even though such marriage is adjudged to be void by a court of competent jurisdiction. Section 1025, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 1037). It is not material, however, upon what ground the decree of nullity was granted to appellant; for the court had jurisdiction, and the decree, even if erroneous, is binding on appellant and appellee, and cannot be questioned in this case. Nothing in the opinion is in conflict with the doctrine declared in State v. Otis, 135 Ind. 267, 21 L. R. A. 733, cited by appellee. In that case this court held that in case of the seduction of a female under the age of twenty-one years under promise of marriage, in violation of the provisions of § 1992, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2078), the subsequent marriage of the parties was a bar to the further prosecution for such crime. The wife in that case had not attempted to have the marriage set aside for fraud, and the marriage was therefore binding upon the parties and all other persons, including the state, until its nullity was declared by a competent tribunal. Tomppert v. Tomppert, supra. If the wife in that case had obtained a decree of nullity against Otis, it would have been a judgment of the court that no marriage had ever existed between them, and the fact that there had been a marriage voidable at the election of the wife would not have been available as a defense by Otis after such decree of nullity.

It follows that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the third paragraph of the amended complaint.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the third paragraph of the amended complaint, with leave to file an amended and additional paragraph of complaint, if desired, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

v.
Joseph N. SMITH, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A statute requiring emery wheels to be provided with blowers to carry away the dust arising from their operation is, at least so far as it applies to dry wheels and to the protection of persons continuously employed over them, a constitutional exercise of the police power.

2. A statute permitting certain uses of a dry emery wheel without a blower, while requiring a blower for other uses, is not class legislation as between operatives when the rules apply to all persons equally.

NOTE.—Police power to protect health of employees.

The exercise of the police power to secure the safety of employees against accidents by statutes requiring various precautions, such as guards around dangerous machinery, is more common than the exercise of the same power for the protection of the health of employees, and the constitutionality of such statutes does not seem to have been contested. Only the statutes for the protection of health are considered in this note, with reference to statutes for the prevention of accidents only so far as they may be aimed also against dangers to health. These are not numerous but are very important.

A statute to compel street railway companies to protect employees from exposure to the inclemency of the weather when engaged on any part of an electric, cable, or steam car except the rear platform, by providing an inclosure within which they may work, is upheld in State v. Smith, 58 Minn. 35, 25 L. R. A. 760. The court says that "when going at the rate of 8 or 9 miles an hour, perhaps against a head wind, and with the mercury below zero, the position of the motorman is one not merely of discomfort, but of actual danger to health, and sometimes to life."

And a similar statute in Ohio is sustained in State v. Nelson, 52 Ohio St. 88, 26 L. R. A. 317, in which it is said: "The act is clearly authorized as a police regulation to protect the health and promote the comfort of those engaged in operating electric cars."

A statute prohibiting the employment or exhibition of girls under fourteen years of age as dancers or in theatrical exhibitions is upheld, in People v. Ewer, 141 N. Y. 129, 25 L. R. A. 794, as an exercise of the power of the state as parens patriæ to protect the physical, mental, and moral welfare of the child. The court said: "The scanty dress of the ballet dancer, the pirouetting and the various other described movements with the limbs and the vocal efforts cannot be said to be without physical prejudice to the physical condition of the child," although still more stress was laid on the danger to the mind and morals of the child.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating a statutory provision regulating the use of emery wheels. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Arthur Webster, with Messrs. Corliss, Andrus, & Leete, for plaintiff in error:

The act of the legislature here in question is unconstitutional because it deprives the owner of a factory operating emery wheels of his liberty and property without due process of law. Mich. Const. art. 6, § 32; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 115, 50 Am. Rep. 636.

Those who voluntarily subject themselves to the inconveniences of any certain employment do not need and cannot demand the protection of the law.

Tiedeman, Pol. Power, 122*b*, p. 432.

The use of emery wheels has always been a legitimate occupation, but now the state makes it a crime unless certain conditions are complied with. It is not the business of the legislature to keep guard over the health or comfort of the individual citizen.

St. Louis v. Fitz, 53 Mo. 582; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 433, § 122*c*.

The law, if constitutional, must necessarily deprive the proprietor of the small workshop of his constitutionally guaranteed liberty.

It is unequal, partial, and discriminating in its operation.

Messrs. Allan H. Frazer and Ormond F. Hunt, for defendant in error:

The only limitation upon the legislative power is whether the provisions are reasonable.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of a violation of the statute requiring emery wheels to be provided with blowers to carry away the dust arising from their operation. Pub. Acts 1893, p. 151, and 3 How. Anno. Stat. § 1690*zl*. Counsel for the defendant assert that they care to raise but one question, viz., the constitutionality of this law. It is not disputed that the state may regulate the use of private property, when the health, morals, or welfare of the public demands it. Such laws have their origin in necessity. Prentice, Pol. means of ingress and egress to persons employed in mining and a metal tube from top to bottom of a shaft through which communication may be had, with other requirements, including that of ventilation of mines, is held constitutional, in Com., Williams, v. Bonnell, 8 Phila. 534; and Com. v. Wilksbarre Coal Co. 29 Phila. Leg. Int. 213. But in this case the statute seems to be more for the safety against accidents than for the health of the employees.

In England there are enactments to secure ventilation and safety of mines, but no question as to the constitutionality of these acts of Parliament can arise.

The Illinois act of May 28, 1879, requiring an escapement shaft in every coal mine worked by or through a shaft, slope, or drift and in which more than ten miners are employed in each twenty-four hours is declared, in Loose v. People, 11 Ill. App. 445, to be enacted to protect the health and insure the safety of the persons employed in the mines, and not for the benefit of mine owners.

In Com., Williams, v. Bonnell, supra, the court says of the Pennsylvania act: "Of its constitutionality we have not the slightest doubt,"—and describes it as nothing more nor less than "a mandate to the operators of coal mines that they shall so work them as not to injure the health nor endanger the lives of persons employed in and about them."

Cases involving statutory regulations for the protection and safety of workmen in mines are treated in a note to Consolidated Coal & M. Co. v. Clay (Ohio) 25 L. R. A. 848.

A declaration that the eight-hour law applicable to mines, factories, and smelting establishments would not be constitutional is made in Re Eight-Hour Law (Colo.) 39 Pa. 328, but nothing is said therein as to the police power in respect to health, and the decision is based on the doctrine against class legislation.

In denying the validity of an act prohibiting the manufacture of cigars or the preparation of tobacco in any form in tenement houses, the court said, in Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636: "This law was not intended to protect the health of those engaged in cigar making, as they are allowed to manufacture cigars everywhere except in the forbidden tenement houses;" and again: "It is plain that this is not a health law, and that it has no relation whatever to the public health."

A statute making ten hours the limit of a day's labor for railroad employees, and declaring them entitled to extra pay for any additional time, is held unconstitutional as class legislation, in Wheeling Bridge & T. R. Co. v. Gilmore, 8 Ohio C. C. 658, 1 Ohio Dec. 390. But the court says: "Nor have we reason to doubt the constitutionality of statutes prohibiting the employment of minors under eighteen years of age, and women in certain employments for more than ten hours per day."

A provision in a city charter that employees of contractors doing work for the city shall not be allowed to work more than eight hours per day is held constitutional in People v. Warren, 77 Hun, 120, but nothing is said in the case as to any intent to protect the health of such employees. The court quotes the case of United States v. Ollinger, 55 Fed. Rep. 959, construing a similar provision in an act of Congress as to employment on public works of the government or of the District of Columbia, and says: "We are not aware that the constitutionality of that act has ever been questioned."

But in Re Kubach, 85 Cal. 274, 9 L. R. A. 482, the validity of an ordinance limiting labor of employees in carrying out a contract with a city to eight hours per day, is denied, yet the court says that "if . . . the employment were such as might be unfit for certain persons, as, for example, females or infants, the ordinance might be upheld as a sanitary or police regulation," and quotes from Cooley's Constitutional Limitation as follows: "Some employments, for example, may be admissible for males and improper for females, and regulations recognizing the impropriety and for-invalid because it does not apply to all, not even to all who use emery wheels, because some may use with water, and others may not work continuously. Again, it is contended that it is invalid because it prohibits a man from running his own machine continuously without protection. We need not concern ourselves with the last objection, because we have not the case before us, and for the reason that the law may be valid to the extent that others are protected, and invalid in the particular mentioned, if such a construction is unavoidable. For the purposes of this case, it may be said that all persons who are given continuous employment over dry emery wheels are within the provisions of this act. This singles out no class, as it applies to all persons who use emery wheels in that manner. Necessarily the practical application is limited to those who engage in such business, but such is the case with many laws. All criminal laws apply only to those who choose to break them. This law applies to all who choose to use the emery wheel. The legislature has seen fit to permit certain uses of the dry wheel without a blower, while in other cases it is required. This is competent, and is not class legislation, as between operatives. It fixes the limits of use without a blower, and requires it after such limits are passed; but the rules apply to all. The vital question in this case is the right of the state to require the employer to provide, and the employee to use, appliances intended for the protection of the latter. Laws of this class embrace provisions for the safety and welfare of those whom necessity may compel to submit to existing conditions involving hazards which they would otherwise be unwilling to assume. Among them are provisions for fire escapes, the covering or otherwise rendering machinery safe, the condition of buildings, ventilation, etc. In the main, where the necessity is obvious, they commend themselves to those who have at heart the welfare of their fellows, and should be upheld if they do not contravene private rights. The Constitution secures to the citizen the rights of life, liberty, and private property, and, as the only value in the latter consists in its use, it follows that the right to use private property is within the provision. There can, however, be no doubt that the use of private property may be regulated by law. No one would think of questioning the validity of laws regulating the manufacture, use, and sale of dangerous drugs or explosives, or laws designed to insure safety in railway travel. The inspection of boilers, fire escapes upon hotels, means of exits from churches and other buildings which the public are wont to frequent, are familiar instances of the exercise of the police power. These rules are defended upon the ground that they are bidding women engaging in them would be open to no reasonable objection. The same is true of young children, whose employment in mines and manufactories is commonly, and ought always to be, regulated."

A statute prohibiting the employment of persons under eighteen years of age, or of women, in any manufacturing establishment more than sixty hours per week is held in Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 120 Mass. 383, to be sustainable as a health or police regulation.

But on the other hand it is held, in Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, that a statute prohibiting the employment of females in any factory or workshop more than eight hours in any one day or forty-eight hours in any one week is unconstitutional, not only as partial and discriminating, but also as a purely arbitrary restriction upon the fundamental right of the citizen to control her own time and faculties. The court admits that, "as a general thing, it is the province of the legislature to determine what regulations are necessary to protect the public health and secure the public safety and welfare;" but adds that, "inasmuch as sex is no bar, under the Constitution and the law, to the endowment of woman with the fundamental and inalienable rights of liberty and property which include the right to make her own contracts, the mere fact of sex will not justify the legislature in putting forth the police power of the state for the purpose of limiting her exercise of those rights, unless the courts are able to see that there is some fair, just, and reasonable connection between such limitation and the public health, safety, or welfare proposed to be secured by it." It is not clear from the opinion whether or not the court intends to deny the power of the legislature to limit to any degree the hours of labor for women in any employment, although it quotes from Tiedeman on Limitations of Police Power the statement that "there can be no more justification for the prohibition of the prosecution of certain callings by women, because the employment will prove hurtful to themselves, than it would be for the state to prohibit men from working in the manufacture of white lead because they are apt to contract lead poisoning, or to prohibit occupation in certain parts of iron-smelting works, because the lives of the men so engaged are materially shortened."

But statutes requiring fire escapes on factories, the guarding of dangerous machinery, and many other precautions against accident or injury to health of employees, are numerous and their constitutionality usually acquiesced in. It is because the freedom of contract is interfered with that the constitutionality of such statutes is denied in the case of Ritchie v. People. Yet the freedom of contract is by no means unlimited. That of infants and married women has always been limited for their own protection. That of other persons also has been limited in some cases solely for their own benefit such as in cases of usury and of contracts with pension attorneys. Likewise, a shipper is denied the right to contract with a common carrier against the latter's liability for negligence for the reason, at least in part, that they are not deemed to be on the same footing. The degree of the danger and of the harm to be avoided seems to be the true test of the right of the legislature to interfere with the freedom of acts or contracts of individuals. If this be true, it is a question of police power and of public policy for the legislature and not for the courts to decide, as declared in the main case of PEOPLE v. SMITH.

The power to protect employees against their own contracts is involved, not only in the cases above mentioned, but in respect to their contracts as to the medium of payment of their wages, as to which, see note to Avent-Beattyville Coal Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 28 L. R. A. 273; and also as to the time of payment of wages, as to which see note to Re House Bill No. 1230 (Mass.) 28 L. R. A. 344. The conflict of decisions on this question of the power to limit contracts between master and servant is marked, and the question is far from settled.

necessary to the safety of the public; not the entire populace, but such persons as shall lawfully place themselves in a position requiring such protection. Where the law is aimed at acts or conditions which threaten contagion,—as where sewers, disinfection, or quarantine is required,—the necessity of and the power to make such laws are obvious. But at first blush they may not be so apparent where there is no direct danger to others than the party whose business is sought to be regulated, and those with whom he contracts. It is contended in this case that neither the public welfare nor health is involved, inasmuch as the protection sought to be afforded is limited to the individual employee, who, by his contract of employment, signifies a willingness to use the machine in its dangerous condition, and therefore cannot be heard to complain. It is the law that a manufacturer may provide inferior and even dangerous machinery, tools, and utensils; and enterprises more or less hazardous are common and lawful. Men may contract to use such machinery, or to perform dangerous service, and have no remedy if injured. But we are not aware that the police power is limited by such contracts. As between the parties themselves, the contract may cut off legal redress for injuries sustained; but we are not satisfied that the authority of the state is limited to the protection of those who do not sustain contract relations with each other. In the absence of a law requiring fire escapes, one who works in a high building and is injured may be held to have assumed the risk incident to his employment, but we know of no rule that precludes the state from making a regulation requiring fire escapes to be placed upon high buildings, though the only object be to facilitate the escape of employees who are under contract to work there without such appliances for escape. Fire escapes in hotels, and means of exit in theaters and public halls are required by law for the benefit of patrons, who are there by virtue of contract relations with the proprietor. So long as the rule is general, and the danger to the public—i. e., that portion of the public who are subjected to the danger—is clear, it is a proper subject for legislative intervention. In Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636, is cited to sustain the proposition contended for, but it cannot be said to have decided the question, although allusion is made to voluntary submission to alleged dangerous conditions. The case does not dispute the power to regulate the business of private persons where the public welfare requires, but does deny the power of regulation in the absence of such necessity, where the law has no relation to the public welfare or health. See also Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 122*c*, pp. 433–436. The case of People, Nechamcus, v. Warden of City Prison, 144 N. Y. 529, 27 L. R. A. 718, is an interesting one upon this question, and although the decision there laid down is criticised (perhaps justly) by Mr. Justice Peckham in a dissenting opinion, concurred in by two of his associates, the power to regulate private affairs where the public necessity exists is asserted in an exhaustive opinion by the same learned judge in the case of Health Department v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 32, 27 L. R. A. 710, in the course of which the power to regulate the appliances for manufacturing is asserted. 145 N. Y. 43, 44, 27 L. R. A. 714. The opinion says: "Hand rails to stairs, hoisting shafts to be inclosed, automatic doors to elevators, automatic shifters for throwing off belts or pulleys, and fire escapes on the outside of certain factories,—all these were required by the legislature from such owner and without any direct compensation to him for such expenditure. Has the legislature no right to enact laws such as this statute regarding factories unless limited to factories to be thereafter built? Because the factory was already built when the act was passed, was it beyond the legislative power to provide such safeguards to life and health as against all owners of such property unless upon the condition that these expenditures to be incurred should ultimately come out of the public purse? I think to so hold would be to run counter to the general course of decisions regarding the validity of laws of this character and to mistake the foundation upon which they are placed." The trouble with these cases arises over the inability of the courts to fix a rigid rule by which the validity of such laws may be tested. Each law of the kind involves the questions: (1) Is there a threatened danger? (2) Does the regulation invade a constitutional right? (3) Is the regulation reasonable? In the present case no controversy is raised over the first of these. Hence we are not called upon to discuss it. As is implied by what has been said, the constitutional right to use property without regulation is plain, unless the public welfare requires its regulation. If the public welfare does require it, the right must yield to the public exigency. And it is upon this question of necessity that the third question depends. All, then, seems to be embraced in the question of necessity. Unless the emery wheel is dangerous to health, there is no necessity, and consequently no power, to regulate it. Unless the blower is a reasonable and proper regulation, it is not a necessary one. Who shall decide the question, and by what rule? Shall it be the legislature or the courts? And, if the latter, is it to be determined by the evidence in the case that happens to be first brought, or by some other rule? Does it become a question of fact to be submitted to the jury or decided by the court? Of all the devices known to human tribunals, the jury stands pre-eminent in its ability to determine cases in direct violation of and contrary to law, without impairing the binding force of the law as a rule of future action. We have known of instances where the question of the constitutionality of acts, as applied to the particular case on trial, has been made to depend upon the finding of the jury upon the facts in the case. But there is a manifest absurdity in allowing any tribunal, either court or jury, to determine from testimony in the case the question of the constitutionality of the law. Whether this law invades the rights of all the persons using emery wheels in the state is a serious question. If it is a necessary regulation, the law should be sustained, but, if an unjust law, it should be annulled. The first case presented might show by the opinions of many witnesses that the use of the dry emery wheel is almost necessarily fatal to the operative, while the next might show exactly the opposite state of facts. Manifestly, then, the decision could not settle the question for other parties, or the fate of the law would depend upon the character of the case first presented to the court of last resort, which would have no means of ascertaining whether it was a collusive case or not, or whether the weight of evidence was in accord with the truth. It would seem, then, that the questions of danger and reasonableness must be determined in another way. The legislature, in determining upon the passage of the law, may make investigations which the courts cannot. As a rule, the members (collectively) may be expected to acquire more technical and experimental knowledge of such matters than any court can be supposed to possess, both as to the dangers to be guarded against and the means of prevention of injury to be applied; and hence, while under our institutions the validity of laws must be finally passed upon by the courts, all presumptions should be in favor of the validity of legislative action. If the courts find the plain provisions of the Constitution violated, or if it can be said that the act is not within the rule of necessity in view of facts of which judicial notice may be taken, then the act must fall; otherwise it should stand. Applying this test, we think the law constitutional, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

The other Justices concur.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, in response to which the following opinion was handed down:

Per Curiam:

Our attention is called to the fact that under the opinion heretofore filed the act as originally passed might be held unconstitutional, inasmuch as it does not discriminate between dry and wet wheels, which last, it is said, cannot possibly produce dust, and therefore do not require the blower. This question was necessarily passed upon in the former opinion, as the amendment could not be sustained if the original act was invalid. In addition to what was said in the former opinion, we may say that two sufficient reasons may be given for not holding the first act void: First. We are not able to say that a wheel may not be run with or without water at pleasure, in which case it would seem proper that the blower should be required as an efficient means of preventing its being run without water. Second. If this were not so, the act might be construed as applicable only to wheels capable of producing dust, as the language of the act clearly shows that it was intended to reach such, and an act should always be so construed as to bring it within the Constitution, if it can be reasonably done. Coit & Co. v. Sutton, 102 Mich. 324, 25 L. R. A. 819, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 768.

R. H. HUNT et al., Respts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. Ejectment by the owner of the fee of a public street will lie to recover possession thereof, subject to the public easement, from one who has placed a permanent obstruction thereon.

Mr. John W. Snyder, for respondents:

On July 29, 1858, the dedication of the plat of Ranson & Tally's addition vested the fee as well as the easement to the 30 feet then called George street and afterwards Tracy avenue in the county of Jackson.

Rev. Stat. 1855, § 8, p. 1536; Gen. Stat. 1865, § 8, p. 248; Hannibal v. Draper, 15 Mo. 639; Ragan v. McCoy, 29 Mo. 366; Reid v. Edina Bd. of Edu. 73 Mo. 304; Glasgow v. St. Louis, 87 Mo. 682, Affirming 15 Mo. App. 123.

But if it did not so vest the fee it is manifest that the three platters of said addition kept the fee themselves.

Campbell v. Kansas, 102 Mo. 339, 10 L. R. A. 593.

In neither event could the fee to the east 15 feet of this 30-foot strip by this act of dedication have "floated" so to speak across the way and immediately vested in the owner of the land just east of this 30-foot strip.

George street was properly vacated in strict conformity to legislative provisions.

Laws 1866, p. 200; Laws 1877, p. 186.

If it was not vacated, still no suit in ejectment can be brought in Missouri for street property by an adjoining property owner. When, as here, the fee is in the city, the city brings the suit.

On petition for rehearing.

This suit of ejectment cannot be sustained in law unless the abutting property owner does own the soil in the street and the presumption that he owns it is overcome by the proof that neither he nor any owner of the lot ever became seised of the soil in front of the lot, by the old-fashioned, iron-clad rules governing the alienation of real estate.

The platters in dedicating the 30 feet as Tracy avenue as the eastern boundary of their addition sold nothing to the owner on the east side of said strip and consequently this owner (plaintiff's grantor) got nothing from the platters of Ranson & Tally's addition (by the law of appurtenances or otherwise), for he bought nothing of them.

Subject to the easement of the public, the exclusive ownership of the soil—the freehold and all the profits—remains in him who owned the ground before the highway was laid out, and he may maintain trespass or waste, or recover possession subject to the easement.

Hare & Wallace's note in 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. pt. 1, p. 167, appended to the case of Doraston v. Payne.

If without the statute the owners keep their property, and with the statute lose it, the disseisin is worked by the statute. Therefore the statute should be absolutely precise in declaring its purpose to work said result, since it not only overturns the common law but the fundamental legal conceptions of property rights.

It conveys an easement to the county or, if more is conveyed, it is all conveyed to the county.

What the lot owner has is not vested in him by the statute, but is in the lot owners notwithstanding the statute; in short, left there by the statute, not put there by statute. The statute certainly does not undertake to impoverish the generous dedicator of his freehold rights.

The dedicators of boundary streets own all of them, and their grantees take, not simply to the center of the street, but to the opposite edge.

Healey v. Babbitt, 14 R. I. 533; Re Robbins, 34 Minn. 99; Taylor v. Armstrong, 24 Ark. 102; Watrous v. Southworth, 5 Conn. 305.

Macfarlane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is ejectment to recover a strip of land 15 feet wide and 120 feet long, in Ranson & Tally's addition to Kansas City. The petition was in the usual form, and the answer was a general denial. Ranson & Tally's addition was duly platted, and the plat recorded in 1858. Tracy avenue was the eastern boundary of the addition, and was marked on the plat as being 30 feet wide. In June, 1878, an order was made by the county court of Jackson county purporting to vacate said avenue. The land lying east of and adjoining Tracy avenue was known as "Land 16," and was owned by the proprietors of the platted addition. In 1880 land 16 was duly platted as Primrose Hill addition. This plat shows Tracy avenue, but no part of it is upon the land platted. Lot 1 of said addition, 120 feet deep north and south, abuts on the east side of Tracy avenue. In 1886 an ordinance was passed by the council of the city of Kansas City, entitled "An ordinance to widen and establish Tracy avenue from Sixth street to Independence avenue." This ordinance purported to establish an avenue 50 feet wide, the east side of which corresponds with the west side of said lot 1, and to condemn land therefor. Plaintiff is the owner of said lot 1, having acquired title thereto in 1889, and the land she sues to recover is a strip 15 feet in width lying west of and adjoining her lot, and being the east part of the land heretofore designated as Tracy avenue. Tracy avenue lies north and south between Sixth street on the south and Independence avenue on the north. The land in controversy is of that part of Tracy avenue immediately south of Independence avenue. The last-named avenue is graded and improved, while the land in suit, or the top of it, is from 25 to 40 feet above the grade of Independence avenue, and is inaccessible from it, though from Sixth street north it is graded nearly to the land in dispute. The evidence tends to prove that immediately after the order of the county court vacating Tracy avenue was made defendants took possession of the land in issue, fenced it, and have continued to hold the actual possession. There was also evidence tending to prove that defendants had not held possession for ten years before the suit was commenced. It is not disputed that defendants occupied the land by buildings when the suit was commenced, and that plaintiff's access to the street was thereby cut off. The question of defendants' right to a verdict by reason of their adverse possession of the premises was submitted to the jury upon instructions to which no objection is now made. Defendants asked an instruction to the effect that upon the pleadings and evidence plaintiff could not recover. This the court refused. The court gave a number of instructions asked by defendants, upon which the case was submitted to the jury, whose verdict was for plaintiff. A motion for a new trial, assigning as grounds therefor the ruling of the court in giving and refusing instructions, was filed by defendants. This motion was sustained, upon the ground, as stated by the court, that "plaintiff had not shown any right to recover." From the order granting a new trial, plaintiff appealed.

According to the opinion of the court, necessarily implied from its ruling in granting a new trial, the instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence should have been given. The question, then, is whether, under the pleadings and evidence, plaintiff established a right upon which he might recover.

1. It is contended by defendants, in the first place, that ejectment will not lie as a remedy to the owner of land abutting upon a public street for special injury caused by the permanent obstruction by a third person of the surface of the street adjacent to his property. We find no case in this state in which the question as thus presented has been directly passed upon, and the decisions in the courts of other states are not in entire harmony. It is, however, well settled in this state that such an owner has rights to a highway peculiar to himself, and which are not possessed by the public generally, and for a violation of which he may maintain an action, notwithstanding the wrong done also affects the public Cummings v. St. Louis, 90 Mo. 264; Henry Gaus & Sons Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 113 Mo. 315, 18 L. R. A. 339; Rude v. St. Louis, 93 Mo. 414. One of the private rights of an abutting owner is that of free access to his premises from the street. Dillon says: "A person owning or in possession of premises abutting on a public highway or street, whose right of access to the same is unreasonably or unlawfully obstructed, may recover from the person causing such obstruction damages for the private injury he sustains where such damages are particular, direct, and substantial." Mun. Corp. vol. 2, § 730. But the principles announced in these authorities do not answer the question. An action of ejectment is a possessory remedy, and a judgment therein for a plaintiff entitles him to the possession of the premises recovered. It is insisted, therefore, that the execution of such a judgment would, as to the public, be the mere substitution of one wrongdoer for another. The leading authority in support of this position is Cincinnati v. White, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452, in which the right to a remedy by ejectment was denied on the ground that the plaintiff, by invoking that remedy, seeks to be put in actual possession of the land, and this would subject him to indictment for a nuisance, the private right of possession being in direct hostility with the easement or use to which the public is entitled, and taking possession subject to the easement being utterly impracticable. Sedgw. & W. Trial of Title to Land, § 131. Certain provisions of our statute on ejectment, such as the right of plaintiff to recover rents and of a defendant to recover for improvements, appear to be also inconsistent with the rights and obligations of an abutting owner. But it is the settled doctrine, both at common law and in this state, that the owner of premises abutting on a public street is presumptively the owner of the fee to the center thereof, subject to the easement to which the land is devoted. Snoddy v. Bolen, 122 Mo. 483, 24 L. R. A. 507; Grant v. Moon, 128 Mo. 49, and cases cited in each. The grantee of the easement is not the owner or occupant of the land over which the easement extends, but presumptively has a mere right of use for the purposes for which the grant was made. The owner has the right to the use of the land for all purposes not inconsistent with the grant. Snoddy v. Bolen, 122 Mo. 493, 24 L. R. A. 512; Gamble v. Pettijohn, 116 Mo. 377. "The right to the fee and the right to an easement in the same estate are rights independent of each other, and may well subsist together when vested in different persons." Sedgw. & W. Trial of Title to Land, § 132. As these interests are independent, each owner should have all remedies necessary and appropriate for securing their enjoyment, and, when permanent occupation is taken of the land, thus depriving the owner of his right to its qualified use, no remedy would be so adequate as that of ejectment. An action for the trespass might be maintained, but by that remedy damages for the injury could only be recovered. The cause of the wrong could not be abated, or plaintiff restored to his right to the land. Repeated actions for damages would afford very inadequate redress.

It is true, the owner could only recover the land subject to the easement, and should not be authorized by the judgment to continue a public nuisance in the street, but the extent of the recovery could be regulated by the judgment. The character of the right would also determine the proper elements of damages. As the owner could not himself apply the land to uses inconsistent with the rights of the public, neither could he authorize others to do so, and therefore the rental value could not be recovered by way of damages. Neither could defendants recover under the name of improvements for the value of obstructions placed in the streets which constitute a public nuisance. The re-erection of such improvements could not be attended with the good faith which is necessary to entitle a defendant in ejectment to recover their value.

No good reason can be seen why ejectment should not lie, and that it does lie has been affirmed generally by the text-writers and courts. Angell & D. Highways, § 320; Sedgw. & W. Trial of Title to Land, supra; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 536; Goodtitle v. Alker, 1 Burr. 133; Carpenter v. Oswego & S. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 655; Smeberg v. Cunningham, 96 Mich. 378; Taylor v. Armstrong, 24 Ark. 105; Wright v. Carter, 27 N. J. L. 76; Ayer v. Phillips, 69 Me. 50. The recent case of Snoddy v. Bolen, supra, is a clear recognition of the right of the owner to a remedy by ejectment against a third person of premises which are subject to an easement. That suit was ejectment to recover possession of the minerals beneath the surface of the street. The right to the remedy was not questioned, and a judgment for possession was affirmed. The remedy was thus approved, though there was no discussion of the point. It is true that the rights asserted and the wrongs complained of in that case and the judgment demanded could not affect or interfere with the public easement, but there is no difference in the principle involved in that case and this one. The distinction lies in the character of the relief to be granted. The relief must be so qualified as not to cause an interference with the easement. We are of the opinion that ejectment is a proper remedy.

2. But it is claimed by defendants that, inasmuch as Tracy avenue was the limit of Ranson & Tally's addition on the east, the title to the entire street remained in the original proprietors of the adjacent lots and their grantees, and the east half of the street did not pass, by virtue of the plat, to the owners of the land on the east side, which now constitutes lot 1. The conveyance of a lot or tract of land bordering on a street or road presumptively carries the title to the center of the road or street if the title of the grantor extends that far. "The presumption is that the grantor did not intend to withhold any interest in the street or highway." "The presumption may be overcome," says Judge Black, "but it must be overcome by something stated in the deed which shows distinctly an intention to withhold an interest in the street." Snoddy v. Bolen, supra. But it is held that, if the street is the limit of the dedicator's title, a conveyance of an abutting lot will carry the fee in the street to the opposite boundary thereof. Snoddy v. Bolen, 122 Mo. 485, 24 L. R. A. 507, and 122 Mo. 493, 24 L. R. A. 512, and cases cited. But the presumption only extends to common-law dedications, to streets condemned for public uses, and to statutory dedications, where the quantity of interest is not prescribed. The presumption is founded on considerations of public policy in order to avoid controversies between owners of adjacent land over property in which the public has an interest, and may also become involved. There can be no doubt that for the same considerations of policy it is entirely competent for the legislature to prescribe the legal effect of voluntary dedications of streets, and to prescribe the quantity of interest in the streets the dedicator parts with as well as that taken by the public. Angell & D. Highways, § 308. The statute in force when the plat was filed provided that such plats "shall be a sufficient conveyance to vest the fee of such parcels of land as are therein expressed, named, or intended for public use in the county in which such town, village, or addition is situate, in trust, and for the uses therein named, express or intended, and for no other use or purpose." Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 1536, § 8. Under this statute it has been held that the fee passes from the owner by the dedication. Hannibal v. Draper, 15 Mo. 634; Reid v. Edina Bd. of Edu. 73 Mo. 304. It has also been held that the fee held by the city was subject to the trusts contained therein or intended thereby, from which it could not be diverted. Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v. St. Louis Grain Elevator Co. 82 Mo. 121; Ferrenbach v. Turner, 86 Mo. 419. Considering the policy of the law, as before stated, to be that the owners of property abutting on a street own the fee also to the center of the street, subject to the easement, it is clear to us that the statute was intended to effect the same purpose; that is, while the fee passed out of the dedicator, and vested in the county, the public only secured an easement, and the abutting owners, respectively, the beneficial right in the land to the center of the street. This seems to be the view taken in the Snoddy Case, 122 Mo. 491, 24 L. R. A. 507, and 122 Mo. 493, 24 L. R. A. 512, though what is there said may be considered only dicta. We are therefore of the opinion that by the statutory dedication of Tracy street the fee to the land passed out of the dedicators, and the ownership, subject to the easement, vested in the abutting owners, respectively, to the center of the street.

3. What is said in the foregoing paragraph answers the contention that Tracy avenue was vacated by order of the county court. But it may be said that the statute authorizing county courts to vacate streets expressly provided that 'all title thereto shall vest in the person owning the property on each side thereof in equal proportions, according to the length or breadth of such ground as the same may border on such street." Acts 1866, p. 200; Acts 1877, p. 186. So, when the street was vacated, the title to the east half of it vested in the owners of the land on that side. Such an adjustment of the title, in order to avoid further controversies, was required by the statute, subject to which only was the vacation authorized. The statute is founded upon the same principle of public policy as the rule which, under other circumstances, vests in the abutting owners, respectively, the title to the center of the street. Upon the theory of the defense, then, that the street was vacated by order of the county court, plaintiff has title to the land sued for, and is entitled to the possession.

4. But, though the street may have been vacated, it seems to have been re-established by an ordinance of the common council of the city of Kansas City. That ordinance provided for the assessment of damages for the property taken, and for the assessment of benefits against the adjacent owners to pay the same. If the damages were paid, and the proceedings became complete, then the land became a street, and the easement over it vested in the city, and the ownership to the center of the street, subject to such easement, became vested in plaintiff as abutting owner. In any event, it seems to us that plaintiff made out a case upon which she is entitled to recover. It may be proper to say that the entire proceedings, either for the vacation of the street or for re-establishing it, are not before us, and we express no opinion as to their sufficiency to accomplish the purposes intended. As plaintiff asserts her rights upon the theory that the land is a part of the street, we have so treated it. So, also, we have considered the claim of defendants on the theory that it was vacated.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to set aside the order granting a new trial, and enter a proper judgment for plaintiff upon the verdict.

A city is not liable for a thin strip of ice 3 feet wide and 1½ to 2 inches thick across a sidewalk, where it was formed by the discharge of water from a pipe which had been put up to take water from a sag in an eaves trough.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I think that the instruction of the circuit judge was correct. The sidewalk was about 10 feet wide, and in good repair. The building, which stood on or near the line of the street, was provided with an eaves trough, which had sagged near the center, so that the accumulated water would flow over to the annoyance of the tenants. To remedy this, a pipe, 2 inches in diameter, had been put up, to take the water from the sag. This came down to the ground, and discharged its water about 2 feet from the sidewalk, and part flowed over the walk, resulting in the thin strip of ice, 3 feet wide, and 1½ to 2 inches thick. Todd v. Troy, 61 N. Y. 506; Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs, 104 N. Y. 459, and Hall v. Lowell, 10 Cush. 260, cited by my Brother Montgomery, evidently make no distinction between accumulations of ice and snow caused by natural and by artificial means. In Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs the water had fallen from the roof of a barn situated near the street, and the ice and snow had accumulated on the walk to the depth of 3 feet.

What are the artificial means, as distinguished from natural ones, for which municipalities must be held liable? People have the right to erect buildings from which the water must flow to the ground, and, if it comes faster than the ground can absorb it, it must flow onto the sidewalks. Is the city to be held responsible, under the prior decisions of this court, for this rightful and natural flow of water, when the weather has intervened and frozen it? People have the right to conduct the water from the roofs of their buildings to the ground by means of gutters, eaves troughs, and conductors. This water must seek the street gutters, to be carried away. This is done in all villages and cities where direct communication is not made from the conductor to the sewer. Why should the city be held liable for accumulations caused by the action of the weather in these cases, and not liable for accumulations, just as dangerous, resulting from other causes, such as snow from sidewalks and street-car tracks, which was the case in Hutchinson v. Ypsilanti, 103 Mich. 12, or ice formed in consequence of the stoppage of a catch basin, causing the water to flow over the sidewalk, which was the case in Kannenberg v. Alpena, 96 Mich. 53? Many, and probably most, houses are built higher than the sidewalk, with sloping yards in front. Under the rule sought to be established in this case, municipalities would be liable for the natural flow of the water from such buildings over the yards to the sidewalks. Such is the doctrine in Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs. Such holding is not consistent with the former decisions of this court. The nonliability for the natural flowing and spreading of water, as it comes from conductors, is recognized in Hughes v. Lawrence, 160 Mass. 481. In that case a gutter had been constructed across the sidewalk. It was claimed that the water had been collected in this gutter, and frozen, to the height of a foot or more, and that upon this the plaintiff fell. It was claimed by the defendant that the water had spurted from holes in the conductor over the sidewalk, forming a thin coating of ice, upon which the plaintiff fell. It was held competent for the jury to find that the former constituted an obstruction, but that the latter did not. I think that the logical conclusion from our former decisions is that the defendant is not liable.

Judgment affirmed.

Hooker, J., concurring:

I concur with my brothers Long and Grant in the affirmance of the judgment in this cause. Unless we are to say that it is the duty of the owners of all lots that are higher than the adjoining highways to prevent the flow of water therefrom, or promptly remove any ice that may form by reason of the escape of water from their buildings upon the adjoining highways, and, further, that the city must at its peril see that such duties are performed, we must hold that the plaintiff should not be permitted to recover in this cause. If a liability exists, it is because of a defect in the highway; and, if ice frozen upon a sidewalk is a defect when it is caused by water flowing from a roof, why should it not be when it flows from a vacant lot, or when it falls upon the walk, or is caused by the melting of snow upon or adjoining such walk? If the liability of a city for damages resulting from a failure to keep its highways in a reasonably safe condition for travel extends to cases where such condition is not ascribable to defects in the construction and maintenance of the way, or where the action of the officers of the city or their negligence in the performance of a duty is the cause, it may be contended that cities must cause the streets to be patroled, in search of bricks or coals that fall from wagons, for the treacherous banana peel upon which the unwary are sure to slip, and for tacks or bits of glass or other rubbish, which puncture the tires of bicycles. I think such are not defects in the highway.

The presence of the water upon the walk was due to no act of the city or its officers. It is manifest that it must escape from the premises across the walk if it is to reach the gutter. Were there no building there, and the lot of uniform grade, the whole surface of the walk might be expected to be covered with ice; while, if undulating so as to form a valley, the water might flow over the walk within limited bounds, no wider than in this case. Shall we say that because the water falls upon a roof instead of the ground, or because it finds its way through a conductor instead of a valley, to a given point, that there is a liability upon the city? Is it desirable to omit the eaves trough, and shed the water uniformly upon the walk, making it wet and icy throughout, rather than at one point, where the presence of the conductor may indicate the possible presence of ice? Unless we are prepared to say that the city must see that water does not flow upon the sidewalk at all by so constructing its ways, walks, sewers, and other devices as to prevent it, or that it must remove all ice from walks seasonably, I do not see how we can hold the city liable in this case. There is not even the gutter across the walk (which walk the city had the responsibility of keeping in repair) that—in the case of Hughes v. Lawrence, 160 Mass. 481 — the court said "it was competent for the jury to find . . . constituted a defect in the way, and that its construction was such as to cause a special deposit of ice at that particular place;" thus distinguishing between the gutter, which the city was responsible for, and the conductor, admittedly defective, with which, as in this case, it had nothing to do. The trend of Michigan decisions has been against the theory that every obstruction in a highway is a defect for which the city is to be mulcted in damages by persons meeting with accidents by reason thereof. In Agnew v. Corunna, 55 Mich. 428, a bowlder 4 feet high, taken from the roadbed, and placed by the side of the road, was held not to be a defect in the way, which was said to be in good repair. McKellar v. Detroit, 57 Mich. 158, 58 Am. Rep. 357, upon which case the learned circuit judge relied, emphasizes this rule in an ice case. The case differs from this chiefly as to the manner in which the water came upon the walk, being in that case caused by the melting of snow which fell there. The case of Joslyn v. Detroit, 74 Mich. 459, should not be overlooked. This was where a lot owner placed a pile of sand in the way, by consent of the city authorities, which was the cause of a buggy being overturned, to the injury of the occupant. A verdict for the plaintiff was sustained, Mr. Justice Campbell dissenting. In Hutchinson v. Ypsilanti, 103 Mich. 12, Mr. Justice Grant distinguished Joslyn v. Detroit, supra, and Hayes v. West Bay City, 91 Mich. 418, showing that the city was an active agent in causing obstruction. I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

Montgomery, J., dissenting:

This action is brought to recover for injuries received by plaintiff while traveling on a sidewalk in Mill street, in the city of Jackson, the cause of the injury being a formation of ice, consisting of a ridge from 1½ to 2 inches thick in the center, and sloping from the center either way, and in all covering about 3 feet in width. The evidence disclosed that this ice was formed by the freezing of a discharge of water carried by a conductor pipe of an adjoining building, and that this pipe had been in use for seven or eight years before the accident, and that the common result was for ice to form at this point whenever freezing weather followed mild weather; that this particular ridge of ice had been there in its then condition for two or three days, and, as one witness stated it, perhaps a week, before plaintiff received her injuries. The circuit judge, being of the opinion that the case was ruled by McKellar v. Detroit, 57 Mich. 158, 58 Am. Rep. 357, withdrew all questions from the jury, and directed a verdict for defendant. The occasion of the fall in McKellar v. Detroit was a ridge of ice caused by the tramping of snow and melting and freezing, until the surface became uneven; obviously, the result of climatic influence, combined with the ordinary and proper use of the street. Rolf v. Greenville, 102 Mich. 544, depended upon a state of facts precisely analogous to that in McKellar's Case. Hutchinson v. Ypsilanti, 103 Mich. 12, was held to be within the doctrine of McKellar's Case, on the ground that the use of the street to accumulate snow thrown from the walk or street-railway track was reasonable, and the city should not be liable because ice formed on the uneven parts of the snow thus found. In Kannenberg v. Alpena, 96 Mich. 53, it appears that the city had made provision for carrying off the water by gutters, and by supplying catch basins; that, on the occasion in question, the catch basin had become stopped up, so that the water was not carried off. As was stated, no fault was found with the catch basin's construction, and it was held that there was in that case no liability. It was said in that case: "Some cases have been cited in support of the plaintiff's claim, but they relate to instances where, by neglect of the hydrants or water spouts, water was permitted to drop upon the walk, where it froze. These cases are clearly distinguishable from the case before us." It will be seen that no case has been before this court involving the precise question presented. We are well satisfied with the doctrine advanced by the court in the McKellar Case and those which have followed it; and the doctrine that a failure to provide against a formation of ice in the usual way, as a result of freezing, cannot in this climate be deemed a result of want of due care or a defect in the street, is too fully settled to be open to question. But it does not follow from this that a walk cannot be constructed so as to make the accumulation of ice unnecessary at a particular point, and unnecessary and unnatural, in a sense that it may be treated as a defect in the way. Much less can it be said that a city may permit water to be carried on the walk by artificial means, in such manner that the inevitable result is the formation of ridges of ice, and, without using any precaution to prevent this dangerous impediment to travel, shield itself under the claim that the climate is the real cause of the difficulty. Todd v. Troy, 61 N. Y. 506; Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs, 104 N. Y. 459; Hall v. Lowell, 10 Cush. 260; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 459; Scoville v. Salt Lake City, 11 Utah, 60. And see the true distinction noted in Stanton v. Springfield, 12 Allen, 566, and again in Hughes v. Lawrence, 160 Mass. 474; Corbett v. Troy, 53 Hun, 228. See also Canfield v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 78 Mich. 356.

We think the plaintiff made a case entitling her to have the jury determine whether the walk was reasonably safe for public travel, and whether the defect had existed for such length of time as that the city authorities, in the execise of reasonable supervision, should have known of and remedied the defect, by removing the accumulation of ice; and, in the determining of this question, the jury had the right to take into consideration the fact, if proved, that the waterspout in question had for years been the occasion of ice formations at this point, as this would have a direct bearing upon the degree of diligence required by the city in removing the ice accumulation in question.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The ownership of the fee of land under the Great Lakes is held to be in the state, and not in the riparian owners, and the state is held to have power to dedicate a portion thereof as a public hunting ground subject to rights of navigation, on which it is unlawful to cut rushes or other vegetation. (Mich.) 694.

Police regulation of business.

Numerous provisions in an ordinance regulating junk dealers and pawnbrokers are held valid and reasonable, among them the power to revoke the license arbitrarily. (Mich.) 116.

An ordinance making it unlawful to bring any secondhand clothing or bed furniture into a town for sale is held void as an attempt absolutely to prohibit a lawful business. (N. C.) 122.

A statute requiring the weighing of coal hoisted from mines, but applying only to mines whose product is shipped by rail or water, is held unconstitutional for arbitrary discrimination, and also as interfering with the freedom of contract between the employer and employees. (Ill.) 445.

A statute prohibiting mine owners from digging within 5 feet of a division line without consent of the adjoining owner is held to be within the police power of the legislature. (W. Va.) 800.

The constitutionality of a Sunday law prohibiting business by barbers, without applying to any other class of business, is denied in Illinois on the ground of its discrimination. (Ill.) 659.

In agreement with the Illinois decision, and contrary to the decision in New York, a California case holds that a Sunday law applicable only to barbers is unconstitutional. (Cal.) 664.

The use of a blower for dry emery wheels is held to be within the constitutional power of the legislature to require. (Mich.) 853.

Abatement of nuisance.

Seizure and destruction of nets used in unlawful fishing, by officers in obedience to a statute, is held not to violate the constitutional rights of the owner. (Wis.) 380.

Game laws.

A statute making it unlawful to ship deer, elk, etc., by a common carrier to any commission merchant or sale market, is held constitutional on the ground that property in such game is subject to all police regulations. (Minn.) 131.

Civil rights.

A drug store in which soda water is sold is held not to be a place of public accommodation and amusement within the Illinois civil rights act. (Ill.) 566.

Carrying weapons.

The constitutional right to keep and bear arms is held not to be violated by a statute prohibiting unauthorized bodies of men to drill and parade as a military organization, even if certain independent military bodies are exempted therefrom. (Mass.) 606.

Statutes.

The right to impeach an enrolled bill properly signed and promulgated by legislative journals is denied on review of the authorities. (Ky.) 203.

Elections.

A striking instance of the effect of holding a statute unconstitutional is discussed in a case which refuses to grant an injunction to prevent an election under an unconstitutional statute, where the effect would be to prevent any subsequent election of a legislature. (Ind.) 578.

Some interesting questions as to ballots are decided in case of an election for school directors; among them the decision that the words "long term" after one of two names on a ballot are sufficient to satisfy a statute requiring the office to be designated, where the election is only for school directors and but one of them for a long term. (Ill.) 656.

The sufficiency of a petition for a county-seat election is held not subject to question after the election has been held and the vote given in favor of a change. (N. D.) 723.

Civil service law.

The Massachusetts statute attempting to give veterans the right to appointment without examination on their sworn statement of their own qualifications, with a certificate of three reputable citizens, is held unconstitutional. (Mass.) 253.

Official bond.

On the disputed question of the liability of the bondsmen of an officer for money lost by a bank failure, the Nebraska court decides that such loss or theft of the money is no defense. (Neb.) 223.

License.

A license of $50 per quarter for retailers of goods having no fixed places of business in the municipality is sustained, although this is a heavier license than is charged upon regular dealers at fixed places of business. (Cal.) 527.

A license tax of $4 per month on the business of selling secondhand clothing is held valid, although general merchants were taxed only $1 per month. The constitutional rule of uniformity is held not to be violated, since the tax is uniform on each class. (N. C.) 123.

A license tax of which a part of the proceeds goes to the county is held not to be within the meaning of the Montana Constitution prohibiting the legislature to impose taxes in any county for county purposes. (Mont.) 635.

Excise money.

The constitutionality of the New York excise tax law of 1896 is sustained against objections that the provision for giving part of the proceeds to cities and towns was an appropriation of public money, and that because of discrimination between cities according to population it was within the constitutional provisions as to general and special city laws. (N.Y.) 344.

Taxes.

The value of a water power made by a dam in a river between towns is held apportionable between the lands in the different towns covered by the water, although the power is all used in one town only. (N. H.) 621.

The right of the legislature to tax credits in the hands of trustees of nonresidents is sustained. (Mich.) 439.

An exemption of the property of a corporation not actually and in fact within the state, and the stock held by its stockholders, precludes the imposition of a franchise tax on the company, laid upon all its capital except that which is invested in the state. (N. J.) 643.

Public use.

A statute providing for a subway under the streets of a city, to be occupied by a street-railway company under a lease, is held to be for a public use for which taxation may be authorized. (Mass.) 610.

Sewer assessment.

One who has refused to pay an invalid assessment for a sewer is held properly chargeable with his share of the expense as a condition of the right to use it, when other property owners have paid the assessments on them. (Ohio) 734.

Interest on sewer assessments cannot be collected unless the law so provides; and the city cannot require it by by-law unless power to make the by-law is conferred upon it. (Conn.) 822.

Ferries.

The validity of a ferry license is sustained against various objections, and held to be exclusive within specified limits. (S. D.) 315.

Jurisdiction.

The power of a court on foreclosure of a railroad mortgage is held to extend to a part of the road extending into another state and which was formerly owned by another company which had been merged by consolidation. (Ga.) 208.

The jurisdiction on constructive service merely, to grant alimony and custody of children in a divorce suit, is denied where defendant and the children, although domiciled in the state, are absent from it and do not appear. (Cal.) 82.

Municipalities.

The provision that resident owners only shall be allowed to appeal from the annexation of territory to a city is sustained against the claim that it is unconstitutional. (Ind.) 586.

A municipal contract, the performance of which extends over a series of years, and payments of which are to be made annually, is held not to create an indebtedness for the total amount, but only for the amount falling due each year, within the meaning of a provision limiting indebtedness. (Mo.) 157.

Streets.

A thin strip of ice formed from water discharged near a sidewalk by a pipe to take it from a sag in an eaves-trough is held not to make a city liable. (Mich.) 861.

An ordinance prohibiting the use of salt on street railways is sustained against the claim that it impairs the franchise of the street-railway company and is unreasonable. (N. J.) 170.

Water supply.

A by-law of a water company having a franchise to supply a city and its inhabitants with water, whereby it declines to make contracts with any persons except owners of property or their authorized agents, will not justify the company in refusing to supply a tenant in possession of property if he is ready to pay in advance. (Mont.) 697.

II. Contractual and Commercial Relations.

A promise to an infant by a near relative other than a parent, although occupying the relation of parent, to pay for services at the end of a certain period, if relied upon, although made in jest, will give the infant on discharge during that time a right to recover in assumpsit for the actual value of the services. (W. Va.) 400.

The use of electrotype plates is involved in a case for breach of a contract giving the right to use them but not to sell them or multiply them for the purpose of selling. (Mass.) 283.

Restricting publication.

A contract restricting a person who sells the goodwill of a newspaper from conducting another journal in the same county is sustained as reasonable and as unaffected by the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of the press. (N. C.) 829.

Conditional sale.

Waiver of forfeiture on default of an instalment due on a conditional sale of goods by virtue of an extension of the time is held binding so as to prevent forfeiture before such time expires. (Md.) 455.

The enforcement of a judgment bond as collateral security taken on a conditional sale of a chattel is denied after the sale has been rescinded by retaking possession of the chattel. (Pa.) 467.

Railroad ticket.

A somewhat peculiar case of a mistake by the ticket agent in a union depot in giving a ticket to a passenger for a different road than that desired is held not to make the company whose ticket was furnished liable for the mistake. (Ind.) 154.

Sale of timber.

After logs are cut under a contract for the sale and removal of timber, the failure to remove them within the time agreed is held not to forfeit the purchaser's title to them. (Mich.) 102.

Expectancy.

The law on the subject of releasing the rights of an heir is involved in a California case, which upholds a covenant releasing such an interest and estopping the promisor from contesting any disposition of certain property, whether by deed or will. (Cal.) 595.

A bank having an overdue note of a depositor amounting to more than his deposit is held entitled to deny payment of his check without any formal application of the deposit to the note. (Ky.) 568.

A special deposit which must be returned in case of the insolvency of the bank is shown by depositing gold coin in pledge to secure an obligation on a bail bond. (Cal.) 479.

Fraud of a bank receiving a note for collection when insolvent is held not to alter the rule that collections under direction to remit by draft will not be impressed with a trust which will give a preferential claim against the bank's assets. (Tenn.) 715.

Negotiable paper.

A statement on the face of an order upon a savings bank that the depositor's book must accompany the order is held to defeat its negotiability. (Me.) 590.

An indorser of a note who gives directions to erase his name before its transfer is held relieved thereby from liability to a transferee who knows the facts. (Utah) 266.

A peculiar case of a forged indorsement of the name of a fictitious person to whom the payee of a draft had by a fraudulent scheme been induced to indorse it holds that the drawee bank paying the draft on the faith of such indorsement is not thereby relieved from liability to the payee. (Tenn.) 778.

Reliance upon mortgage security to a note without any care or inquiry as to the financial standing of the maker of the note, or the purchase of it merely for the purpose of acquiring the mortgaged property by foreclosure, is held not to preclude a purchaser of the note in the ordinary course of business from being a bona fide holder. (N. D.) 730.

Insurance.

A new kind of insurance appears in the guaranty against loss by insolvency of customers. Such a policy is construed to be a contract of insurance. (Wis.) 383.

A policy to indemnify an employer against liability for claims for injuries to employees is construed to be one of indemnity against liability, and not against damages, and therefore prior payment of such claims is not a condition of a right of action on the policy. (Wis.) 388.

A clause making insurance incontestible except for fraud, after two years from date, is held to preclude the defense of suicide in case of death after that time. (Iowa) 473.

The right of a mortgagee to sue in his own name on an insurance policy payable to him as his interest may appear is sustained to the extent of recovering his interest in the proceeds, where the insurance was taken in compliance with a requirement of the mortgage. (Mass.) 615.

Members of a mutual insurance company are held liable for assessments after the cancelation of membership to pay losses previously accruing, and such assessments may include interest and expenses incident thereto, costs of litigation, and allowance for contingencies. (Mich.) 481.

The unreasonable action of the appraiser of an insurer in refusing to accept an umpire unless he is taken from a distance is held to constitute a waiver of arbitration. (Tenn.) 172.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

The legal capacity of a corporation to take a devise of property in excess of the amount allowed by its charter is held in Maryland to be a question that cannot be raised collaterally by private persons who, as distributees of the testator's estate, are interested to defeat the gift. (Md.) 293.

Pooling arrangements to control the voting of stock are held to be contrary to public policy. (N. C.) 265.

Matured certificates in a benefit society are held to make the holders creditors, with the rights of creditors in case of subsequent insolvency of the organization. (Md.) 311.

The rights of the members of a mutual insurance company to relief from liabilities for unauthorized insurance by the company are discussed in an important Iowa case in which the company had issued some policies in excess of its powers, and misrepresentations had been made as to a guaranty fund. (Iowa) 490.

Foreign corporation.

Compliance by a foreign corporation with statutory requirements was held sufficient to prevent dismissal of an action brought by it, although this compliance was made after the action was brought and motion for dismissal made. (Mo.) 400.

Religious society.

The trustees and the majority of the members of a religious association belonging to a larger body are denied power to withdraw its property from connection with the denomination against the protest of a minority. (Mich.) 92.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY.

An illegitimate child is held not to be a "child" within the meaning of a statute giving a father a right of action for the death of a child, even when he had acknowledged the child and there was no other next of kin and the mother was dead. (Ind.) 509.

A parent's liability for alienating the affections of his son from the latter's wife is held to depend upon malice as distinguished from a proper parental regard for his son's welfare. (Miss.) 623.

Under the Indiana statute giving an unmarried woman a right to an action against her seducer it is held that this is extinguished by the marriage of the parties, but that a decree of the nullity of the marriage for fraud will destroy the effect of the marriage as a bar to the action. (Ind.) 848.

A decree of land within the state as alimony in a divorce suit is sustained, although rendered on service by publication only against a husband who is absent from the state, on the ground that it is substantially a proceeding in rem. (Kan.) 289.

V. FIDUCIARIES.

The act of an agent in loaning his principal's money, without the latter's knowledge to his own debtor, receiving his pay out of the proceeds, is held to constitute such a fraud that the principal may repudiate it. (Miss.) 631.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

Libel.

Caustic criticism of a book in respect to its theories or literary composition is held not to be libelous so long as it does not attack the character of the author or misstate the contents of the book. (Mich.) 104.

Condition of buildings.

A landlord is held not obliged at common law to provide fire escapes on a leased building. (Tenn.) 782.

A contractor whose work in repairing a building has been completed and accepted is held thereby relieved from liability for injuries subsequently sustained by a third person in consequence of negligence in doing the work. (Ind.) 837.

The lighting of common halls and stairways at night in a building occupied by tenants is held not to be a part of the duty of a landlord to provide safe passages. (N. J.) 645.

Attracting children.

The doctrine of dangerously alluring premises on which children are injured is denied application to a railroad yard properly fenced, except on the side where the railroad tracks are, and in which a child is injured while playing on a pile of ties. (Tex.) 825.

Explosions.

Statutory liability for failure to give notice of an explosion in blasting rock is held to include the frightening of a horse by the explosion, and the persons "approaching" who were entitled to notice are held to include those who have just passed the place. (Me.) 588.

The liability of a natural gas company for the destruction of a building by explosion of gas is sustained, where for several years the gas had been leaking and it passed under the frozen surface of the ground for 80 or 90 feet to the building. (Ind.) 146.

An explosion of the generator of a refrigerating machine while inexperienced men were attempting to stop a leak by tightening nuts while the machine was under pressure is held to show negligence on the part of the employer, producing an unequal strain on the parts by unskilful work in tightening the nuts. (Cal.) 524.

Electric shocks.

Liability of a telegraph company for injury to an employee caused by an electric shock is sustained in a case in which the jury found that the employer was negligent. (N. J.) 351.

The liability of an electric light company for injury to a tinsmith who touched a defectively insulated wire on the outside of a building is held to be a question for the jury. (Mass.) 400.

An electric wire charged with a dangerous current when wound on a reel near the ground upon an electric light pole in a street is held to show negligence on the part of the electric company. (N. J.) 700.

Other injury to employee.

An attempt by workmen whose work and wages are temporarily suspended during the unloading of materials not connected with their work but at the place thereof, to aid the person having the load, whereby they injure him, even if it is done by the direction of their foreman, is held not to create any liability on the part of their employer. (Mass.) 605.

A temporary room in a mine, formed by excavating ore and used as a working place in getting out ore, is held not to be within the rule requiring a safe place to be furnished for employees to work in. (Mich.) 435.

The doctrine of the assumption of obvious risks is held applicable notwithstanding a statute requiring the employer to properly guard cog-wheels near which an employee works, and the assumption of such risks is held not to contravene public policy. (N. Y.) 367.

Overflow.

The fact that a railroad embankment which has large trestles for the passage of water to some extent increases the overflows of water upon low lands is not enough to show that the railroad company is liable, if it does not appear that trestles would be as economical or as safe and suitable for the road. (Miss.) 262.

Standpipe.

The rule as to dangerous agencies is applied to a standpipe filled with water, and the proprietor held liable for injuries to a guest of his own tenant caused by the fall of the standpipe. (Ohio) 736.

Bicycle collision.

A collision between a bicycle attempting to pass on the right side and a truck which is turning toward the curb of a street is held not to show necessarily that the driver of the truck was in fault. (Conn.) 651.

Failure to carry passenger.

A somewhat novel action for failure to transport a passenger on a railroad because the company had only two engines, and one of them broke down while the other was in a shop for repairs, is sustained notwithstanding the poverty of the road, but punitive damages are denied in the absence of any personal insult or indignity. (N. C.) 543.

Injury to passenger.

Negligence of the servants of a railroad company, whereby a passenger on the train of another company using the road of the former under a contract is injured, is held to render the owner of the train liable to the passenger. (Conn.) 539.

A dangerous hole in the floor of a toilet room in a railroad depot, when the room, although unlighted, was left with an open door from a waiting room, is held to make the carrier liable for injury to a person sustained in consequence. (Mass.) 101.

An unusual case as to the liability of a carrier for the murder of a passenger when asleep in a sleeping car denies the carrier's liability, in the absence of anything to show knowledge of the danger. (Va.) 792.

Where a lady passenger with a light, gauzy dress was burned by a lighted match touching her dress as it was thrown by a passenger who had lighted a cigarette, the street railway company was held not to be liable. (Mo.) 167.

Due care on the part of a street railway company operating a double-track road, when it discharges a passenger at a street crossing, is discussed in a case which holds that the speed of cars must be so controlled and such warning of their approach given as will reasonably protect a passenger. (Ohio) 276.

Collision with street car.

The overloading of a street car and its excessive speed are held gross negligence rendering the street railway company liable for a resulting collision. (Va.) 220.

A boy riding uninvited and without the driver's knowledge upon a private vehicle is held unaffected by the driver's negligence, when suing a street railway company for injuries caused by a collision between a car and the vehicle. (Ohio) 340.

Injury by train.

Attempting to cross a railroad track when obscured by smoke, immediately after a train has passed, is held such contributory negligence as will defeat a recovery for injuries received. (Ind.) 149.

An unusual case of the use of a railroad track by licensees or by persons invited thereon is that of the employees of a corporation whose shops are on both sides of the road, between which the crossing is kept planked by the railroad company for their use, and it is held that in making a flying switch at such place the company owes them reasonable care. (Conn.) 530.

The use of salt to keep railroad switches free from ice, if necessary, is held not to make the railroad company liable for attracting live stock which were killed by trains. (W. Va.) 416.

Loss of baggage.

A peculiar case of trunks checked over the wrong railroad holds that the railroad company is not liable for their loss by the fall of a bridge, in the absence of any fault other than mere negligence. (Conn.) 535.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS.

Accession on wrongful taking.

The doctrine of accession of property wrongfully taken is applied to the cutting and removal of hay, when it was done in good faith but without right. (Neb.) 422.

Recipes.

Carpet manufacturers are held entitled to some record of recipes made by a color mixer in their employ, when, contrary to his duty, he entered them in his own books instead of the books of his employers. (Pa.) 761.

Trees.

Trees overhanging a highway are protected from cutting under orders of selectmen, without the consent of the owner, for the purpose of moving telephone or telegraph wires, under a statute prohibiting them to be cut without such consent by the telegraph or telephone companies. (Conn.) 280.

Oyster bed.

The rights of cotenants in an oyster bed are held to include the right to take natural oysters therefrom without the power of either to exclude the other, even by dredging the premises and placing oyster shells and seed oysters thereon which must be disturbed by taking natural oysters. (N. Y.) 270.

Market stall.

The occupant of a stall in a market under a license revocable at pleasure is held to be a mere trespasser after notice to leave, although he has held over after the time fixed for the annual renting. (N. C.) 706.

Gift.

A Christmas gift by check to an employee, made according to the habit of previous years but in forgetfulness of the fact that his salary had recently been increased, is sustained against an attempt to avoid it for mistake, where the check is collected and the donee not notified of any intent to repudiate it for several months. (N. Y.) 703.

Gift of a bond in trust to be delivered to the donee on the donor's death is held to be valid. (Pa.) 766.

Wills.

Legacies to daughters are held to be adeemed by conveyances to them by the testator by way of gift without any apparent or expressed intent to the contrary. (Mich.) 232.

The sufficiency of a signature of the name of a subscribing witness to a will is sustained, although it was written by another subscribing witness at the request of the former. (S. C.) 77.

Trust.

A deposit "in trust for" another in a savings bank is held to be a prima facie trust which may take effect as against the donor's estate, where all his acts and declarations are consistent therewith. (Me.) 377.

The doctrine that a deposit of money in trust for another will create a trust is limited by a New York case which holds that a mere deposit of one's own money in the form of a trust is not conclusive, and that the depositor may deny that he intended a trust, where he has never informed the beneficiary of it. (N. Y.) 373.

A letter by testator to his wife, to whom his will gives all his estate absolutely, in which he expresses a hope that she may have enough after paying debts to aid his children from time to time, and a desire after she has had the benefit of it during life that they may be given equal shares, is held insufficient to create a trust, and failure to perform the promise is held not to constitute a trust ex maleficio. (Ind.) 298.

An agreement between devisees for the selection of a trustee to whom they shall transfer the lands devised is held to be both a voluntary and executory agreement which may be revoked. (Ill.) 555.

Charities.

A bequest without limitation as to use, made directly to an unincorporated but regularly organized and well established charitable association, is held valid. (N. J.) 625.

Chattel mortgage.

A strong exercise of comity toward mortgagees of chattels in Canada is made by sustaining the rights of such mortgagees of a half interest in horses of which possession had been taken under the mortgage in Canada, as against owners of the other half interest, who had taken a prior mortgage in Michigan on their co-owner's interest before the horses went to Canada, and recorded it after they were brought back, while it did not appear that they knew of the Canada mortgage when they took the horses from Canada. (Mich.) 442.

A landlord's mortgage on his interest in crops in possession of a tenant and yet undivided is held effective as against his creditors under subsequent garnishment. (Iowa) 811.

Fraudulent conveyance.

Overruling a prior decision, an Oklahoma case holds that a conveyance made with intent to defraud creditors is fraudulent as to a transferee, if he had sufficient notice to arouse the suspicion of an ordinarily prudent man and cause inquiry as to the purpose of the transfer. (Okla.) 33.

Pledge.

Oil in a tank is pledged effectively by a written order to the agent in charge of the tank, who accepts it, to hold the oil for the pledgees. (W. Va.) 408.

The holder of a quitclaim deed is allowed the rights of a bona fide purchaser under the New York recording laws. (N. Y.) 370.

Riparian rights.

A peculiar case as to the right to water for irrigation decides that water may be pumped for that purpose, and that the altitude of the land making irrigation by gravitation only impossible does not defeat the right. (Cal.) 190.

Water used for domestic purposes as well as that used for irrigation is held to be within the rule justifying an apportionment of a stream by giving to upper and lower proprietors in turn the exclusive use of the stream for designated periods when the absorption and evaporation would make a division of the quantity fatal to the rights of the lower proprietor. (Cal.) 667.

Surface water.

The limitation on the right to discharge surface waters upon another's land, that the latter must not be unnecessarily injured, is illustrated by a decision against the right to drain into a ditch in a highway contrary to the natural course of drainage, so that the water injures a neighbor, when the land owner might as easily have drained into a ravine on his own premises without injuring his neighbor. (Neb.) 229.

Property of husband and wife.

A deed to husband and wife as "tenants in common" is held to make them such, and not to make them tenants by the entirety. (N. J.) 701.

Community property which by state law is exempt from liability for the husband's debts is held to be beyond the reach of a judgment creditor of the husband, whose judgment was rendered in another state before such property was acquired. (Wash.) 73.

The power of a married woman to dedicate her statutory separate estate to public uses is denied, unless it is accomplished by a joint deed of herself and husband, or by some other statutory mode. The doctrine of equitable estoppel is held inoperative to devest her of such estate. (Ala.) 201.

Aliens.

By operation of the most favored nation clause in the treaty with Italy, subjects of that country are held to have the same rights that Frenchmen have under the treaty with France to acquire and dispose of property in this country in the same way and to the same extent that citizens of this country can do. (La.) 177.

Taxes and tax sale.

Forfeiture of a life estate for failure to pay taxes under the Ohio statutes is held to be limited to cases of valid sale. (Ohio) 805.

A devisee of a life estate in remainder is denied the power to cut off the remainders limited upon his life estate by purchasing the property at tax sales caused by the default of the first taker. (Mich.) 744.

A receiver to take charge of premises held by a life tenant is authorized, in case of the tenant's refusal, to pay taxes and make necessary repairs; and such receiver may be given power to sell the life estate for such purposes. (Minn.) 756.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES; RULES AND PRINCIPLES.

Appeal.

An appeal from a judgment or order entered in exact accordance with the mandate of a previous appeal was held properly dismissed. (Utah) 828.

Process.

An assistant ticket agent in a union depot, although hired by the owner thereof and not by a railroad company for which he sells tickets, is held to be an acting ticket agent within the meaning of a statute as to service of process on a railroad company. (Minn.) 448.

Damages.

Loss of the society and prospective earnings of a child is held not to be included in the elements of damages for injuries resulting in a miscarriage. (Mich.) 142.

Injury to feelings and affections by default in delivering a telegram is held insufficient to sustain a recovery in Ohio. (Ohio) 735.

Nervous paroxysms caused by humiliation and indignity suffered by a passenger wrongfully expelled from a train are held to be a bodily injury for which damages may be recovered. (Cal.) 193.

The measure of damages to be recovered from an innocent purchaser of logs from an inadvertent trespasser is held to be their value immediately after their severance, excluding any enhancement of the value by transportation to another place. (Ala.) 199.

Damages for obstruction of water by a railroad embankment when the road was lawfully built are held recoverable for the entire injury in one action if the parties demand that they be assessed, and successive actions as in case of a continuing nuisance are inadmissible unless both parties fail to ask for the assessment of all in the first action. (N. C.) 708.

Demurrer to evidence.

The constitutionality of the practice of demurring to evidence is sustained on a very elaborate review of the practice and constitutional provisions of the different states. (Tenn.) 354.

Judgment.

An extensive discussion by prevailing and dissenting opinions, of the conclusiveness of an English judgment by default, appears in a Connecticut case which holds it conclusive on the merits, although the cause of action arose in this country. (Conn.) 236.

Levy.

Goods sold to a trader for resale, retaining title as security, are held to be used in the trader's business, within the meaning of a statute making property in his business liable for his debts. (Miss.) 260.

The interest of a person in property held by another as trustee having the absolute title under a trust merely for the division of the proceeds of sales is held not to be subject to levy. (Tex.) 785.

A fugitive from the state intending to return as soon as criminal proceedings against him are dropped is held to be still a resident for the protection of the family homestead from his creditors, when his wife and children continue to reside upon it. (N. C.) 394.

Ejectment.

Ejectment by the owner of the fee of a street is held to be the proper remedy to recover possession, subject to the public easement, from one who has wrongfully made a permanent obstruction thereon. (Mo.) 857.

Foreclosure.

Foreclosure of a mortgage securing a principal sum and interest coupons is allowed to raise the amount due on the coupons before the principal is due. (Ill.) 113.

Partition.

An attempt to partition the interest of parties having reciprocal easements in the use of stairs, halls, etc., when they are owners in severalty of the land, is held to be ineffectual. (Neb.) 451.

Specific performance.

Specific performance of a contract to sell waterworks to a town is sustained, where the owner has refused to agree on a price or appoint arbitrators as the contract requires, where the sale is only part of a larger contract and the parties cannot be placed in statu quo. (R. I.) 740.

Injunction.

An injunction is sustained against a judgment, to let in set-offs, where the judgment creditor is insolvent. (W. Va.) 321.

A peculiar case as to the right of action on an injunction bond denies liability thereon, where plaintiff dismissed his action by consent on an award against him by which he had agreed to abide, since this was not a judicial determination. (Ohio) 329.

A remarkable case of a play in a theater based on the facts of a criminal case then on trial decides that this cannot be restrained by injunction, even if it constitutes a criminal contempt which may be punished, and if it interferes with the administration of justice. (Cal.) 273.

Witness fees.

A person committed to secure his attendance as a witness is entitled to per diem fees during detention, only when he is unable to give security, and this inability arises from his misfortune and not his fault. (Md.) 449.

A contract to pay extra compensation to an expert witness is sustained although he subsequently testified without claiming the extra pay, and accepted statutory fees, and was not in fact asked any questions calling for his expert opinion. (Mass.) 619.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

An appeal given to the mother in a bastardy case from a finding in favor of the putative father is held unconstitutional, where the statute makes the proceeding a criminal one. (N. C.) 396.

The denial of a continuance on an admission that absent witnesses would testify as alleged in affidavits is held constitutional provided reasonable time and opportunity to obtain the witnesses by compulsory process has been given. (Ky.) 108.

Cross-examination of an accused person who offers himself as a witness in his own behalf is held to be unrestricted in respect to the subject as to which he has testified. (Fla.) 133.

Instigation.

Entering a building and taking money therefrom in the company of a detective who has by arrangement with the owner planned the affair to entrap his companion is held not to constitute a punishable crime because of the instigation. (Ill.) 139.

Arson.

Setting fire to one's own dwelling house is held not to be arson, either at common law or under a general provision of a statute against setting fire to any house. (S. C.) 647.

Possession as a crime.

Possession of opium contrary to provisions of a statute is held to be constitutionally made a criminal offense. (Or.) 738.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. The provision for an appeal by the mother from an acquittal of the putative father in a bastardy case, made by N. C. Acts 1879, chap. 92, is in violation of the constitutional prohibition against placing a person twice in jeopardy, as the statute, by imposing a fine upon him when the issue of paternity is found against him, makes it a criminal proceeding. State v. Ostwalt (N. C.) 396

2. An exception to a finding of fact as to negligence, when there is no uncertainty as to the rule by which it is to be governed, but only as to what the conduct was, constitutes no ground of appeal under Conn. act 1893. Peltier v. Bradley, D. & C. Co. (Conn.) 651

5. An appeal from a judgment or order which the district court entered in exact accordance with the mandate of the appellate court upon a previous appeal will be dismissed upon motion of the appellee. Krantz v. Rio Grande W. R. Co. (Utah) 828

Hearing and review.

6. The duty of the supreme court to try the cause anew upon the judgment roll and render final judgment therein according to the justice of the case, which is imposed by N. D. Sess. Laws 1893, chap. 82, does not require the court to perform any functions that do not pertain to appellate jurisdiction as prescribed by the Constitution. Christensen v. Farmers' Warehouse Asso. (N. D.) 730

7. Objections not raised by the briefs in the Illinois appellate court cannot be renewed or made for the first time in the supreme court. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Waterman (Ill.) 654

9. The objection that there was a plain and adequate remedy at law cannot be taken in an equity suit for the first time on appeal. Corey v. Sherman (Iowa) 490

16. Technical error in refusing to strike out mere probative matter from a complaint is not ground for reversal. Sloane v. Southern California R. Co. (Cal.) 193

APPROPRIATIONS.

The restriction on appropriations of public moneys for local purposes without the assent of two thirds of the members elected to each branch of the legislature, made by N. Y. Const. art. 3, § 20, is not violated by the act of March 23, 1896, giving two thirds of the excise taxes thereby imposed to the towns and cities in which they are raised, since such funds, which never reach the state treasury, have by long course of legislation been treated like revenues levied for local purposes, and not as public moneys of the state within the meaning of that constitutional provision. People, Einsfeld, v. Murray (N. Y.) 344

2. A statute requiring a county board of revenue to act in private when passing on any claim or awarding a contract does not violate a constitutional provision that courts must be open, since in such matters it is not in the exercise of judicial power. State, Bragg, v. Rogers (Ala.) 520

Equality; discrimination.

3. A statute exempting certain independent military bodies or organizations from the operation of a provision against parading with firearms is not unconstitutional class legislation, as it grants a special privilege only, which does not interfere with any constitutional rights of others. Com. v. Murphy (Mass.) 606

4. A ferry lease granted under a statute which allows to all who choose the privilege of bidding therefor is not within the prohibition of the organic act of Dakota territory as to "granting private charters or especial privileges," or the constitutional provision against "private or special laws" authorizing ferries. Nixon v. Reid (S. D.) 315

5. A statute permitting certain uses of a dry emery wheel without a blower, while requiring a blower for other uses, is not class legislation as between operatives, when the rules apply to all persons equally. People v. Smith (Mich.) 853

6. A law is not general because it operates upon all within a class unless there is a substantial reason why it is made to operate upon that class only, and not generally upon all. Ex parte Jentzsch (Cal.) 664

7. A statute prohibiting barbers to carry on business after 12 o'clock on Sunday or on a legal holiday, and applying to no other class of labor, is unconstitutional as special, unjust, and unreasonable, working an invasion of individual liberty, since it is based upon no distinction to justify singling out that class of laborers. Id.

8. The police power does not justify a statute which makes it unlawful for barbers to do business on Sunday, without interfering with any other class of business. Eden v. People (Ill.) 659

15. Seizure and destruction of nets by officers in obedience to a statute, in abating a nuisance caused by their voluntary use by the owner in violation of the fishery laws, does not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law or of "a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries" to his property, or make an unconstitutional "distinction" as to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property. Bittenhaus v. Johnston (Wis.) 380

16. A statute making it unlawful to consign any elk, moose, caribou, or deer, or any part thereof except the head or skin, by a common carrier to any commission merchant or sale market at any time, is not an unconstitutional deprivation of property without due process of law, since wild game before it is reduced to possession belongs to the state in trust for the whole public, and any right of property acquired therein is from its inception subject to all limitations imposed by police laws. State, Corcoran, v. Chapel (Minn.) 131

20. Possession of opium without having a license therefor or without having obtained it on the prescription of a physician or pharmacist for medicinal purposes may be made a criminal offense in the discretion of the legislature, without violating any constitutional right. Mon Luck v. Sears (Or.) 738

21. A statute prohibiting the owner of coal land to open or work any mine or shaft within 5 feet of his division line without the consent of the adjoining owner, under a penalty of $500, is within the constitutional power of the legislature as imposing an impartial, just, and reasonable common burden for the benefit of all mine owners and the protection of the surface. Mapel v. John (W. Va.) 800

22. A law which deprives men engaged in the business of mining from the privilege of contracting with each other for the purpose of ascertaining the weight of the coal mined or the amount due them in any manner mutually satisfactory cannot be sustained. Harding v. People (Ill.) 445

8. Several different writings may be read together as constituent parts of a memorandum within the statute of frauds, where, when they are viewed together in the light of the situation and circumstances of the parties at the time they were written, they show unmistakably that they relate to the same matter and constitute several parts of the one connected transaction although there is no express reference from one to the other. Id.

16. Change of stock in the top die of a monument, which is procured elsewhere after breach of a contract to furnish it, does not affect the right to recover damages for such breach, if the substituted stock costs no more than that called for by the contract. Forsyth v. Mann (Vt.) 788

17. An agreement by the purchaser of electrotype plates, that he will not sell them to other parties or multiply them for the purpose of selling them, is valid and enforceable; and a sale by him to a third person, with no restriction as to the use to be made of them, may give his vendor a right to substantial damages for breach of the agreement. Meyer v. Estes (Mass.) 283

18. Under a contract by two firms for the purchase of electrotype plates to be used in a publication in which they are jointly interested, which contract is in form joint and provides that they will be "responsible for any and all wrong use of said electrotypes," a firm which sells all its interest to the other may be held for damages caused by a breach of the contract by the other after the sale. Id.

19. A third person who buys the plates, sheets, and copyright of a published work, cannot be considered as the successor in business of the publisher within the meaning of a contract by the publisher in procuring electrotype plates for it that they should be used only by the publisher "or his heirs or successors in business." Id.

20. For the purpose of determining the right of one who after contracting to furnish electrotype plates, took partners into his business and completed his contract without notifying the other party of the change of firm, to relief against one who has broken his contract as to the use to be made of the plates, the contract must be regarded as performed, not by a volunteer stranger, but by the contracting party acting through the partnership. Id.

1. Railroad companies which might be incorporated under general laws by observing about the same forms and requirements which they do observe in attempting to become incorporated under special charters are de facto corporations, if the special charters are unconstitutional. McTighe v. Macon Constr. Co. (Ga.) 208

2. A corporation de facto can make any contracts, including mortgages of future-acquired property, which the law authorizes corporations to make. Id.

3. The legal capacity of a corporation to take a devise of property in excess of the amount prescribed by its charter cannot be raised collaterally by private persons,—such as the testator's heirs or next of kin,—or in any other way except in a direct proceeding by the state. Hanson v. Little Sisters of the Poor (Md.) 293

4. A charter exempting a corporation from taxes so long as it has a specified amount of property in the state constitutes a contract which cannot be abrogated by the state, and which is not subject to a general provision of the statutes making all charters subject to alteration, suspension, and repeal. State, Singer Mfg. Co. v. Heppenheimer (N. J. Err. & App.) 643

5. A pooling arrangement by which stockholders transfer their shares to trustees to be voted as directed by holders of the majority thereof for the period of five years, unless the holders of two thirds of such stock vote to put an end to the trust sooner, is contrary to public policy and void as against the right of an assignee of some of the trustees' certificates to have the shares thereby represented issued to him in his own name and under his own control. Harvey v. Linville Improv. Co. (N. C.) 265

Forfeiture of franchises.

6. Leave will not be granted to institute proceedings to forfeit the franchises of a solvent active corporation carrying out the purposes of its creation in supplying the necessities of a large number of people, and whose securities are held by innocent persons, in the absence of a clear wilful misuse, abuse, or nonuse of its franchises. State, Mylrea, v. Janesville Water Power Co. (Wis.) 391

7. Waiver of the right to forfeit the franchises of a water company whose property a municipal corporation has the option to acquire for neglect to keep accurate accounts of the cost of construction, as required by the ordinance granting permission to erect and operate the works, is effected by long delay in moving for forfeiture, accompanied by active compulsion upon the company as to extension and operation of the works. Id.

Foreign companies.

8. An action by a foreign corporation which had not, at the time of commencing it, complied with the statutory requirements to enable it to do business in the state, will not be dismissed on motion, if at the time of the motion it has so complied, under a statute providing that foreign corporations which have not complied with the requirements cannot "maintain" any suit or action in the state. Carson-Rand Co. v. Stern (Mo.) 420

9. Debts established in a proceeding for the receivership of an insolvent foreign corporation will be paid out of the assets in the receiver's hands before sending the remainder of the assets to a receiver at the domicil of the corporation. Fuiley v. Fee (Md.) 311

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

D.) 723

2. The "votes polled," contemplated by Dak. Comp. Laws, § 565, requiring in order to effect a change of the county-seat that some place shall have "two thirds of the votes polled," mean the votes polled on the proposition to relocate the county-seat, and not the votes polled for the officer who received the highest number of votes cast at the same election as that at which the proposition was voted on. Id.

1. The right to bring an action ex delicto does not of itself authorize the allowance of smart money. Hansley v. Jamesville & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 543

2. Punitive damages cannot be recovered for failure to transport a passenger on a railroad because an engine was broken down, where there was no personal injury, insult, indignity, or intentional wrong to him. Id.

3. A railroad company is not liable for punitive damages on account of its failure from inability to run a train on the return trip at the stipulated time, merely because it sold a return ticket for that trip, when it had but two engines, one of which was in the shop for repairs and the other was not in good condition, and its roadbed and equipment had been used for a considerable time in a dilapidated condition, although the earnings of the road were all applied to its improvement. Id.

4. The negligent failure of a telegraph company to deliver a message does not authorize an action by him to whom it is addressed, to recover for resulting injury to his feelings and affections, when no other injury results. Morton v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Ohio) 735

5. That an injured woman brings suit by her husband as next friend will not justify the inclusion, as an element of damages, of lost wages, which belong to him. Tunnicliffe v. Bay Cities Consol. R. Co. (Mich.) 142

6. The loss of the society and prospective earnings of the child is not a proper element of damages in an action by a married woman for injuries which resulted in a miscarriage. Id.

7. Paroxysms of the nervous system, caused by the indignity and humilation suffered by a passenger on being wrongfully ejected from a train, constitute a bodily injury for which damages are recoverable. Sloane v. Southern California R. Co. (Cal.) 193

8. A verdict for $1,400 for the ejection of a woman from a train, which obliged her to walk about a mile and caused a recurrence of insomnia and nevous paroxysms to which she had been subject, is excessive. Id.

9. A verdict for $1,000 damages cannot be held excessive in a case of personal injury by which a person's teeth were broken and his knee injured so that he was lame for a long time and unable to work efficiently at his trade for six or eight months. Richmond R. & E. Co. v. Garthright (Va.) 220

10. Damages for the conversion of logs, in an action against one who purchased them innocently from an inadvertent trespasser, are measured by the value of the logs immediately after severance, with interest thereon, excluding any enhancement of the value by transportation to another place. White v. Yawkey (Ala.) 199

11. The measure of damages for the obstruction of water by a railroad embankment lawfully built is the difference in the value of land as it is and as it would have been with the road properly built. Ridley v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. (N. C.) 708

12. Both present and prospective damages can be recovered in a single action for failure to make sufficient passageway for water through a railroad embankment, provided either party to the action demands that permanent damages be assessed. Id.

13. The difficulty and extra expense of procuring the stock for a monument in winter months and the limited time available, where a contractor who had agreed to furnish it in the spring repudiated the agreement late in December, may constitute elements of damages for breach of contract, when the other party was also bound to furnish it to a third party. Forsyth v. Mann (Vt.) 788

14. A contract that in case of the wrongful use of electrotype plates the purchaser shall be responsible for the damages caused the seller, and shall pay a fine to him "equal to the tenfold price of the wrongly used electrotypes," provides for a penalty, and not liquidated damages, which cannot be enforced under the Massachusetts law beyond the actual damages caused by the breach. Meyer v. Estes (Mass.) 283

15. The value of recipes in color books owned by a color mixer who entered them therein, instead of entering them in his employers' books as it was his duty to do, cannot be considered in estimating the damages, if any, which he can recover from them for detaining those books, on the supposition that they belonged to them, when he undertook to carry them away. Dempsey v. Dobson (Pa.) 761

2. GAS.

1. The destruction of a building by the explosion of natural gas which escaped from a leak in a high pressure main 80 or 90 feet distant across a street, and reached the building by penetrating the soil under its frozen surface, renders the gas company liable, where it had made no effort to prevent the leak, although this had continued for several years and notice of the fact had been given to line walkers. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Perrego (Ind.) 146

GIFT. See also EQUITY, 2; TRUSTS, 2.

1. A Christmas gift by a check to an employee according to habit of previous years, although it is made in forgetfulness of the fact that his salary had been increased during the year, and is charged to his account a few days later, but without giving him notice of that fact for several months, cannot be avoided by the donor on the ground of mistake. Pickslay v. Starr (N. Y.) 703

2. In the absence of any reservation in a trust to deliver a bond to a donee upon the donor's death, the secret intention of the donor that it shall be redelivered to him if he survives the donee, and the fact that the trustee would have redelivered it in such case, will not make the gift subject to such a contingency as will defeat it. Re Wagoner's Estate (Pa.) 766

3. A gift made by a bond of the donor including a warrant of attorney for confession of judgment, when delivered to a third person to be held until the donor's death and then given to the donee, who is informed of the arrangement, constitutes a valid gift to the custodian as trustee, although he by mistake made the bond to bear interest during the donor's life; and this blunder was remedied by his indorsing the interest on the instrument without any payment thereof by the donor's direction. Id.

4. The words "in trust for," in the entry of a savings bank deposit, with the same form used on the depositor's book, are sufficient to create a prima facie trust which will be a completed trust or gift in favor of the donee as against the estate of the donor where all his declarations, acts, and conduct are consistent with the presumption arising from the entry itself. Bath Sav. Inst. v. Hathorn (Me.) 377

5. To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, possession and title must pass to and vest in the donee or in a trust for the donee. Anything which remains to be done to complete the gift cannot be enforced; and the gift, while so incomplete, may be revoked. McCartney v. Ridgway (Ill.) 555

3. A renewal after notice of the death of a guarantor on paper discounted by a bank during his life is, so far as his estate is concerned, a payment, and terminates his liability. Id.

2. Land obtained under a homestead claim is in effect taken by purchase within the intent of the Washington community property laws, so that the wife has community rights therein. Kromer v. Friday (Wash.) 671

3. The exemption of community property from liability for a separate and individual debt of the husband extends to a judgment against him rendered in another state for his individual debt long before the community property was acquired. La Selle v. Woolery (Wash.) 73

4. The modes of alienation by a wife, prescribed in an instrument creating a separate estate in her, are not exclusive of other modes, unless such an intention can be clearly gathered from the face of the instrument. Price v. Planters' Nat. Bank (Va.) 214

5. The equitable separate estate of a wife may consist of any property and of any interest therein, and its nature and extent are to be determined according to the intention of the creator as ascertained from the construction of the instrument by which it is created; and it is not arbitrarily limited to such interest or property as would otherwise inure to the husband at common law. Id.

6. A wife is conclusively presumed to have intended that such separate estate as she owned free from restraint at the time of making a contract—even one made before the Virginia Code went into effect—liable therefor, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the contract. Id.

7. The liability of the equitable separate estate of a wife for her debts contracted on the faith thereof does not terminate upon discoverture by the death of the wife or of the husband, unless the estate is determined by the particular event that terminates the coverture. Id.

8. A wife's equitable separate real property which is without restraint of alienation by her may be sold under decree after her death to discharge her general engagements contracted on the faith of her separate estate, where her separate personal estate is insufficient for that purpose, and the rents and profits of the real estate will not within a reasonable time amount to enough to discharge them. Price v. Planters' Nat. Bank (Va.) 214

9. A parent is not liable for advising a son to separate from his wife, if moved by proper parental motives for his son's welfare and happiness, instead of by malice. Tucker v. Tucker (Miss.) 623

2. A probability that more wrong will be done than prevented by an injunction prayed for will prevent granting it. Fesler v. Brayton (Ind.) 578

3. An injunction against proceeding to an election under an alleged unconstitutional statute will not be granted where that is the only law that has not been repealed or adjudged unconstitutional, under which an election of members of the legislature can be had. Id.

4. An injunction against the unlawful discharge of surface waters by an adjoining proprietor, constituting a continuing injury to land, may be granted. Jacobson v. Van Boening (Neb.) 229

6. Voting or controlling stock under a pooling arrangement which is against public policy may be restrained by injunction at the suit of the real owner of the stock. Harvey v. Linville Improv. Co. (N. C.) 265

7. The production in a theater of a play based upon the facts of a criminal case then on trial, although it may interfere with the administration of justice and deprive the accused of a fair trial and may constitute a punishable contempt, cannot be restrained by injunction, under Cal. Const. art. 1, § 9, declaring that "every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right." Dailey v. San Francisco Super. Ct. (Cal.) 273

8. An injunction against the collection of a judgment will be granted to let in a set-off, where the judgment creditor is insolvent. Jarrett v. Goodnow (W. Va.) 321

9. The collection of a judgment may be enjoined for want of consideration for the note on which it was rendered, under W. Va. Code 1891, chap. 126, §§ 5, 6, giving the right to make such defense at law, or to go to equity without giving any excuse for not defending at law. Id.

10. A stipulation in an agreement of submission to arbitration, that it shall not impair the liability of the obligors on an injunction bond, does not impair the rights of such obligors to insist that an award binding on the parties, in pursuance of which they dismiss the suit without judicial action, does not constitute a judicial determination of the suit which will make the bond operative. Columbus, H. V. & T. R. Co. v. Burke (Ohio) 329

11. The dissolution of a temporary injunction and dismissal of the action by consent of the parties, when an award is made against the complainant by arbitrators selected by the parties, who agree to abide the award, and which is not made in any way subject to the approval of the court, will not support an action on the injunction undertaking, since the award is not a judicial determination that the injunction ought not to have been granted. Id.

12. No action can be maintained on an injunction undertaking, either against principal or surety, except in accordance with its terms. Id.

INSURANCE. See also CONFLICT OF LAWS, 2; EVIDENCE, 13, 14.

1. Mere failure to reply to a letter containing a slip to be pasted to a policy of insurance, and which deals with a matter already embraced in the contract, will not make the slip binding on the insured, in the absence of anything to show that the insurer was injured by the silence. Shakman v. United States Credit System Co. (Wis.) 383

Employer's liability.

2. Payment of a claim for injuries to an employee is not a condition precedent to a right of action against the insurer on a policy to indemnify the employer for sums for which he "shall become liable" to employees. Hoven v. West Superior Iron & S. Co. (Wis.) 388

3. Injury to a workman in iron and steel works, caused by the fall of a girder which was being raised by an independent crew building an addition to the works, is within a policy of indemnity against claims for compensation for injuries in "all operations connected with the business of iron and steel works." Id.

Indemnity of merchants.

4. A contract to indemnify a merchant against loss by insolvency of customers is a contract of insurance. Shakman v. United States Credit System Co. (Wis.) 383

5. An agreement attached to a policy insuring against loss by insolvency customers which policy embraces a period of several months prior to the date of its issuance, which agreement accepts customers rated by a mercantile agency not recognized in the policy, will cover the same period as the policy. Id.

6. An exclusion of liability for losses for credit given "exceeding a credit of 30 per cent on the lowest capital rating," in a policy insuring against loss by insolvency of customers, excludes merely the excess above that amount, and not the entire loss in case credit is given above that amount. Id.

7. An agreement attached to a policy insuring a merchant against loss by insolvency of customers, that in case a customer is not rated "within the system" of the insurer by the mercantile agency designated by the policy, and he is rated by another specified agency within such system, losses suffered on his account shall be covered by the policy, will, in case the system requires a rating as to both capital and credit, include a customer rated by the agency designated by the policy only as to credit, but by the other agency as to both capital and credit. Id.

8. An agent of an insurer against loss by insolvency of customers, having power to solicit insurance, transmit applications, collect premiums, and receive pay therefor, may, under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 1977, bind his principal by an agreement to include customers rated by a mercantile agency not recognized in the regular policies of the company. Id.

Forfeiture; defenses.

9. Declarations of an insured person as to forfeiture of the policy are not binding on the beneficiary. Goodwin v. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. (Iowa) 473

10. A copy of an application for renewal or reinstatement of a policy must be annexed to it, to enable the insurer to rely on false statements therein, under McClain's (Iowa) Code, § 1733. Id.

11. False representations or warranties in an application for insurance cannot be relied on by the insurer, if a copy of the application is not attached to the policy as required by McClain's (Iowa) Code, § 1733. Id.

12. Insurance which is invalid by reason of the existence of valid prior insurance will not defeat the prior policy under a provision against additional insurance. Sweeting v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. (Md.) 570

Incontestability.

13. A clause in an insurance policy making it incontestable except for fraud in procuring it, after two years from its date, will control an agreement in the application that death by suicide is not covered by the policy, so that such death after the expiration of that period will not defeat liability on the policy. Goodwin v. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. (Iowa) 473

Notice to insured; address.

14. An insurance policy cannot be canceled for failure to comply with a notice which was misdirected and was returned to the insurer without reaching the insured. Goodwin v. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. (Iowa) 473

15. Notice of change of address of the insured, given to one authorized to collect premiums, is binding on the company. Id.

16. Oral notice to a general agent of an insurance company, of change of address of the insured, given upon the street, is sufficient to bind the company. Id.

Mutual insurance.

17. A mutual insurance company is not changed into a stock company by raising a guaranty fund to secure temporarily the payment of losses when assessments are insufficient, even if such guaranty fund should be held valid. Corey v. Sherman (Iowa) 490

18. The fact that the right to vote and control the management of an insurance company is vested in those members only who are guarantors does not prevent the company from being regarded as a mutual one, or impair the legal existence and the obligations of deposit notes given for premiums. Id.

19. That an insurance policy is renewable from quarter to quarter, instead of being for a period of years upon condition of payment of premiums, does not withdraw it from the operation of the ordinanry rules applicable to life insurance contracts. Goodwin v. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. (Iowa) 473

20. Policies for specific amounts for an all-cash premium, issued to persons who are not bound to pay any assessments, are without authority of law when issued by a mutual insurance company which was organized under Iowa Code, § 1160, authorizing insurance of the property of members of the company only, and which was subject to § 1159, prohibiting a mutual company to take risks upon the stock plan. Corey v. Sherman (Iowa) 490

21. The validity of a policy or certificate constituting a contract between a benefit society and a member thereof is not destroyed by the adoption of some impracticable scheme for the execution of the contract. Failey v. Fee (Md.) 311

22. Holders of matured certificates of a benefit society become creditors thereof and remain so, notwithstanding the subsequent insolvency of the order. Id.

23. A provision in a certificate of membership in a benefit society as to the time of payment will control a different provision in a by-law, where the charter provides for payment as provided either by the by-laws or certificate. Id.

Premium notes.

24. The provision in Iowa Code, § 1146, that premium notes must on their face state that they were given for insurance, is by § 1160 made inapplicable to notes given for mutual obligations by persons organized for mutual insurance under the provisions of § 1058, for organizing corporations in general. Corey v. Sherman (Iowa) 490

25. Premium notes given by members of a mutual insurance company cannot be canceled because the company without authority issued policies in fixed amounts for cash premiums, so long as there is a liability for losses to persons insured on the mutual plan. Id.

26. Makers of deposit notes given to a mutual insurance company to cover future assessments, although they may have been deceived by misrepresentations as to a guaranty fund for partial protection against assessments, are not entitled to have their notes canceled without paying assessments for losses which occurred during the time for which they had the benefit of their insurance,—at least when they have asked no relief until after the company has ceased to do business and assigned its property for the benefit of creditors. Id.

Assessments.

27. The obligation to contribute to the payment of prior losses, on assessments, is not terminated by the insolvency of a mutual insurance company and its assignment for the benefit of creditors. Corey v. Sherman (Iowa) 490

28. The liability of a member of a mutual insurance company for losses occurring during his membership continues until an assessment has been made covering them. Ionia, E. & B. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Ionia Circuit Judge (Mich.) 481

29. Failure to adjust a loss until a member of a mutual insurance company cancels his membership will not relieve him from his share of the liability thereon. Id.

30. Members of a mutual insurance company who did not pay their shares of a void assessment to cover a valid claim will not be permitted to object to the crediting of the amounts paid thereon by other members, upon the sums assessed against them under a new levy to meet the liabilities for which the void assessment was levied. Id.

31. Assessments upon the members of a mutual insurance company to pay a loss may include interest and expenses incident thereto resulting from not paying it when due, and also the costs of litigation incurred in defending actions. Id.

32. Thirty per cent is not an unreasonable amount to levy for contingencies, in levying an assessment upon the members of a mutual insurance company to meet liabilities, where a new assessment for deficiencies arising from failure to collect cannot be made under the law of the state, and litigation in connection with the collection of the assessment is probable. Id.

33. For losses on cash policies unlawfully issued by a mutual company, members who took lawful policies on the assessment plan cannot be compelled to contribute by assessment on their premium notes merely because they knew of the issue of the cash policies, but did nothing to estop themselves from denying liability on account of them. Corey v. Sherman (Iowa) 490

34. Notice of assessments by mutual insurance companies need not be given before they are made, unless expressly provided for by the articles of incorporation and by-laws. Id.

Insolvent company.

35. A guaranty fund is not, strictly speaking, assets of a mutual insurance company for the purpose of determining its solvency, when the company is required to refund all moneys obtained from it. Corey v. Sherman (Iowa) 490

36. One or more stockholders of a mutual insurance company may on behalf of all bring a suit to set aside the appointment of an assignee and to cancel assessments and for other relief, under Iowa Code, § 2549, authorizing one or more persons to sue for the benefit of the whole, when the question is one of common or general interest to many persons, or when the parties are very numerous and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court. Id.

Loss by fire.

37. Damage to insured property by the burning of soot in a chimney, accidentally ignited by the burning of waste paper in a stove, is within the terms of a policy against all loss or damage by fire, especially where there was an accidental obstruction of the flue contributing to the damage. Way v. Abington Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mass.) 608

Cause of death.

38. Death from asphyxiation by illuminating gas while the insured was asleep is not within a clause of an accident insurance policy providing that the insurance does not cover "injuries, fatal or otherwise, resulting from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled." Fidelity & C. Co. v. Waterman (Ill.) 654

39. The words "absorbed or inhaled," in the provision of an accident insurance policy that it does not cover injuries from anything accidentally or otherwise absorbed or inhaled, implies a voluntary and intelligent act as distinguished from an involuntary and unconscious act. Id.

40. The word "absorbed," in a provision of an accident insurance policy that it does not cover injuries from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise absorbed or inhaled, refers only to the process of absorption by sucking up or imbibing through the pores of the body. Id.

Recovery; mortgagee's interest.

41. The market value of property destroyed so far as it is covered by insurance policies is the amount to be recovered. Hickerson v. German-American Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 172

42. A mortgagee is entitled to recover in his own name to the extent of his interest, on a policy of insurance payable to him as his interest may appear, where the mortgagor is by the mortgage required to insure the property for the mortgagee's benefit. Palmer Savings Bank v. Insurance Co. of N. A. (Mass.) 615

43. The interest of a mortgagee in a policy payable to him as his interest may appear does not extend to a subsequent mortgage executed by the wife of the insured, who had in the meantime obtained a conveyance of the property, and in which the husband is not named in the granting clause, although he joins in the instrument to release any marital rights he may have. Id.

Arbitration.

44. The existence of a real difference arising out of an honest effort between insurer and insured is necessary to make operative a provision in a policy for arbitration of differences. Hickerson v. German-American Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 172

45. An insured cannot demand an appraisal and arbitration of the amount of loss while denying all liability under the policy. Id.

46. Appraisers in an insurance case act in a quasi-judicial capacity, and must be free from bias in favor of either party. Id.

47. An appraiser chosen by an insurer cannot demand that an umpire be selected who does not live in the vicinity of the property. Id.

48. An unreasonable demand of an appraiser for the insurer that an umpire be chosen who does not live in the vicinity amounts to a waiver of arbitration. Id.

49. A more general objection to a statement of loss, without pointing out in detail the items excepted to, will not constitute such a failure to agree as makes a case for arbitration under an insurance policy. Id.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

1. A vote on the question of local option may be held by a town alone, under Ky. Stat. § 3704, although a special prohibitory law had been in force in a magisterial precinct that included the town. Lafferty v. Huffman (Ky.) 203

2. A statute exacting the payment of a sum called a tax, and also the giving of a bond, as conditions precedent to the right to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors, is an exercise of the police power, rather than a tax law in the proper sense. People, Einsfeld, v. Murray (N. Y.) 344

3. A general state excise law, although it graduates excise taxes in cities according to their population, but does not follow the classification of cities in the Constitution, is not a general or special city law, and does not relate to the "property, affairs, or government" of cities so as to bring it within the provisions of N. Y. Const. art. 12, § 2, respecting the classification of cities and the reference of special city laws to the mayors of the cities affected thereby. Id.

2. Minor part owners of common property, properly represented in a partition suit, may be effectually bound by a decree of sale for partition under the Washington Code. Id.

3. Service on a foreigner temporarily in the country, made on the eve of his departure, is sufficient to give jurisdiction to render judgment against him, although the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction. Fisher v. Fielding (Conn.) 236

4. An English judgment rendered by default against a citizen of Connecticut after personal service made on him while temporarily in England and upon the eve of his departure is conclusive as to the merits in the absence of fraud, although the cause of action did not arise in England. Id.

5. A judgment for divorce giving a wife the custody of children, and decreeing to her as alimony a tract of land within the state, which she specifically describes and asks for in her petition, may be valid under Kan. Code Civ. Proc. § 72, although rendered on service by publication only against the husband, who is not in the state. Wesner v. O'Brien (Kan.) 289

6. Constructive service of summons cannot give jurisdiction in a divorce suit to award alimony and the exclusive custody of the children, where the defendant and the children are outside of the state and do not appear, even if their domicil is within the state. De La Montanya v. De La Montanya (Cal.) 82

2. The duty to furnish light at night in common halls and stairways of a rented building is not included in the duty of the landlord to make such halls and stairways reasonably fit for passage in the absence of any contract to furnish it. Gleason v. Boehm (N. J. Sup.) 645

3. A visitor passing down an unfamiliar stairway in the dark without waiting for a companion who is familiar with it, or seeking a light, and using no precaution except to feel with hands and feet, is chargeable with negligence which will preclude recovery for injuries in falling down a stairway because of the want of a light. Id.

4. 1. Power to revoke the license arbitrarily, reserved in an ordinance regulating licenses for pawnbrokers and junk dealers, is not so unreasonable that the courts can declare it void. Grand Rapids v. Braudy (Mich.) 116

2. Requiring an indorsement by twelve freeholders on an application for a license by a pawnbroker or junk-dealer is not unreasonable. Id.

3. It is not unreasonable to require a license fee of $25 per annum from junk dealers and secondhand dealers, or $50 from pawnbrokers. Id.

4. A merchant may be compelled to pay a license tax for the sale of secondhand goods, although he pays another for the business of selling general merchandise. Rosenbaum v. Newbern (N. C.) 123

5. A tax of $4 per month levied upon a person as a dealer in secondhand clothing, and a tax of $1 per month on the occupation of selling general merchandise, do not violate a constitutional requirement of uniformity, since this requires uniformity only between those belonging to the same class. Id.

6. A license of $50 per quarter for retailing goods outside of regular places of business is not unreasonable and oppressive as an attempt to prohibit business, although it is heavier than that imposed upon mercantile business at fixed places. Re Haskell (Cal.) 527

7. Discrimination between merchants having fixed places of business in the municipality and also persons "selling to the trade" on the one hand, and retail dealers who have no regular places of business on the other hand, is not unlawful for the purpose of license taxes. Id.

8. An unlawful discrimination as to hawkers and peddlers will not invalidate a wholly independent provision in the same ordinance as to persons selling goods at retail outside those conducting regular places of business. Id.

9. A license tax upon persons and corporations, imposed by the legislature, of which a portion of the proceeds is given to the county, does not violate Mont. 2. Forfeiture of a life estate under Ohio Rev. 3. An administrator with the will annexed, who under a provision of the will has paid the taxes on a homestead estate, which the life tenant has neglected and refused to pay, in order to save it from entire loss to the reversioner, may have a receiver appointed to take charge of the premises, collect the rentals, and apply the proceeds to pay the taxes and necessary repairs and reimburse the administrator for the taxes paid by him; and such receiver may, if the rental is insufficient, sell the life estate under direction of the court, or so much thereof as may be sufficient for the purpose. St. Paul Trust Co. v. Mintzer (Minn.) 756

MANDAMUS.

1. Mandamus lies to compel the president and secretary of a joint-stock corporation to call a meeting of the stockholders, upon the written request of the stockholders holding a specified amount of stock, in accordance with a by-law of such corporation, as Conn. Gen. Stat. § 1945, expressly requires the meetings to be called by such officers. Bassett v. Atwater (Conn.) 575

2. That refusal to call a meeting of the stockholders of a corporation does not work a public wrong is not sufficient to defeat the issuance of a mandamus to compel the officers to do so. Id.

3. The obligations imposed by the by-laws of a corporation upon its officers are not such as rest wholly upon contract, for breach of which there is an adequate legal remedy which will prevent the issuance of a writ of mandamus to compel compliance with them. Id.

4. Mandamus to compel the several officers of a county to hold their offices at the legal county-seat is the proper remedy to determine whether the county-seat has been legally changed, in the absence of any other adequate and speedy remedy to test the validity of the election held to relocate the county-seat. State, Little, v. Langlie (N. D.) 723

5. The remedy of contest in the courts to test the validity of a county-seat election, furnished by Dak. Comp. Laws, §§ 1494–1498, although adequate and speedy, does not preclude the remedy by mandamus to compel the officers to remove their offices to the legal county-seat, as such remedy could be employed before the passage of Dak. Laws 1885, chap. 54, by which such sections were enacted, and § 11 expressly provides that the act shall not affect any of the remedies provided for in the Code of Civil Procedure. Id.

MASTER AND SERVANT.

1. An employer is bound to use reasonable care to protect his servant against unnecessary risk, and is liable for damages occasioned through latent danger of which he ought to have warned him. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McMullen (N. J. Err. & App.) 351

2. A servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment, and also special risks known to him or which he could have known by reasonable care and skill. Id.

3. The assumption of the obvious risks of unguarded cogwheels by an employee, who thus waives the protection of a statute requiring them to be guarded, is not in contravention of public policy. Knisley v. Pratt (N. Y.) 367

4. Disregard of the statutory duty properly to guard the cogwheels of a machine, which is imposed by N. Y. Laws 1890, chap. 396, p. 756, § 12, does not render an employer liable to an employee whose hand was caught in such wheels where the risk was obvious and was assumed by engaging in the work. Id.

5. A temporary room in a mine, formed by excavating ore and used as a working place to get out ore lying around its sides, is not within the rule requiring the master to furnish a safe place for his servants to work in. Petaja v. Aurora Iron Min. Co. (Mich.) 435

6. Failure of miners or a shift boss to notify the timbermen that a newly opened space in the mine is ready to be timbered is the negligence of fellow servants of a trammer who is injured by the fall of ore from the roof because of absence of the timber. Id.

7. An engineer in charge of a refrigerating machine under the direction of the superintendent and general manager of a corporation when he is present, and in sole charge during his absence, with the same power to control workmen that the superintendent had when present, is not at such a time a fellow servant of a workman under his control who is injured while obeying his orders in a dangerous service. Ryan v. Los Angeles Ice & C. S. Co. (Cal.) 524

8. Tightening up the nuts on the generator of a refrigerating machine without reducing the pressure, when there is an ammonia pressure of about 120 pounds which is increasing, is a dangerous work at which a carpenter employed as a general laborer or handyman, but unfamiliar with and uninstructed as to the danger or the mode of operation necessary to preserve an equal strain on all parts of the generator, cannot be set without rendering the employer liable to him for injury resulting from an explosion caused by his lack of skill. Id.

9. A contractor building a brick and mortar foundation for a printing press is not liable to a driver of a van containing rolls of paper, for an injury to him caused by negligence of employees attempting to aid in unloading the van, for which their own work was necessarily suspended, with a suspension of their wages for the time lost, when they attempted to assist without any request of the driver, even if they may have been directed to do so by their foreman. Brown v. Jarvis Engineering Co. (Mass.) 605

1. A statutory limitation on municipal indebtedness may be changed by the legislature by providing for additional indebtedness for a specified purpose. Prince v. Crocker (Mass.) 610

2. "The income and revenue provided for each year," which municipal indebtedness is forbidden by constitution to exceed, includes income for license fees and all other sources. Lamar Water & E. L. Co. v. Lamar (Mo.) 157

3. The aggregate amount involved in a municipal contract the performance of which will extend over a series of years, but payments upon which are to be made annually, is immaterial in determining whether or not the constitutional prohibition of indebtedness exceeding revenues is infringed. It is sufficient if the revenues equal the sums falling due each year. Lamar Water & E. L. Co. v. Lamar (Mo.) 157

4. A provision of a constitution limiting the rate of taxation for municipal purposes to a certain rate, "which shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special," is not a limitation upon a subsequent provision prohibiting indebtedness to an amount exceeding the annual income "without the assent of two thirds of the voters," and requiring provisions for the collection of an annual tax to pay interest on any debt created when it falls due, and to provide a sinking fund to pay the principal. Id.

5. The consent of the city council is not necessary to authorize the legislature to impose a debt upon a city and to take away the control of its streets to some extent from the city officers by constructing a subway under the streets,—especially when the statute is accepted by a majority of the voters of the city. Prince v. Crocker (Mass.) 610

6. The combined action of the legislature in passing a statute and of the inhabitants of a city in accepting it is a sufficient answer to an objection that the statute authorizes the use of public grounds without compensation in the construction of a subway for transportation of passengers. Id.

7. Consent by the inhabitants of a city to a particular use of public grounds may constitute a waiver of the provisions of a statute prohibiting such use, even if that constitutes a contract between the state and the city. Id.

8. An ordinance making it unlawful to import into a town any second-hand clothing, garment, cloth, or bed furniture, for the purpose of selling or offering it for sale, is void as an attempt absolutely to prohibit a lawful business not in itself necessarily a nuisance, but which may be conducted without danger to the community when properly regulated. State v. Taft (N. 9. Municipal ordinances are not within a constitutional provision as to the entitling of statutes. Re Haskell (Cal.) 527

10. An ordinance requiring fire escapes on buildings of specified kinds, when it is a subsection of a general ordinance covering the whole subject of erection of buildings within the city, repeals by necessary implication an earlier ordinance which made a different list of the buildings to be provided with fire escapes, and placed the control of the matter in the hands of a different officer. Schmalzried v. White (Tenn.) 782

1. One who collects upon his own premises a substance liable to escape and cause mischief must use reasonable care to restrain it, and is answerable for the damages sustained by persons or property rightfully on adjoining premises, from its escape for want of such care. Defiance Water Co. v. Olinger (Ohio) 736

2. A dwelling house situated on the same parcel of land and subject to the same general ownership as that upon which a substance liable to escape and cause mischief is accumulated is to be regarded as on adjoining premises, if in the possession of and occupied as a family residence by a tenant of the owner, although such tenancy is at will by an employee of the owner as part of his compensation. Id.

6. The rider of a bicycle has not an absolute right to pass on the right-hand side in meeting a truck which is turning toward that side to the curb of the street, nor can he assume that the driver must turn out for him, but is bound to exercise the same degree of care which the law requires of the driver of the truck to avoid a collision. Id.

7. The driver of a truck for the conveyance of goods is not obliged to turn to the right on meeting a vehicle for the conveyance of persons, under Conn. Gen. Stat. §§ 2689, 2690, as the statute applies only to vehicles for the conveyance of persons. Id.

Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2, 6, attempt to provide for, is inconsistent with the Constitution, especially article 7, declaring that government is for the common good, "and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men," and article 6, declaring that no man, corporation, or association shall have any other title to exclusive privileges than what arises from the consideration of services rendered to the public. Id.

2. The question of title to real estate may be tried in a partition proceeding under the Washington Code. Kromer v. Friday (Wash.) 671

3. Jurisdiction to order a partition sale of community property is not defeated by the fact that the husband by will directs the property to be retained until his children reach majority, since his will cannot affect his wife's right to her half of the property. Id.

2. Prohibiting purchases from boys, intoxicated persons, or habitual drunkards, by licensed pawnbrokers or junk dealers, is not unreasonable. Id.

PLEADING.

1. The want of a theory does not make a complaint demurrable, if it states sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action. Scott v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (Ind.) 154

2. Averments that a conductor negligently and carelessly mistreated a passenger in carrying her beyond her destination, and in stopping at a distance from the depot and roughly ordering and forcing her to get off, are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action, where it is not alleged that she had conformed to the rules of the company and had paid her fare or offered to do so. Id.

3. Averments that a carrier's servants carelessly and negligently caused a passenger to enter a train for which she had a ticket given her by mistake, without averment of their knowledge that she did not desire to take passage on the train indicated by the ticket she held, do not constitute a cause of action against the carrier. Id.

4. Facts sufficient to give jurisdiction of a partition proceeding and suit to try title are shown by allegations of the extent of plaintiff's title, of defendant's title as plaintiff understands it, and that plaintiff and defendant are tenants in common. Kromer v. Friday (Wash.) 671

5. Averment in a bill that plaintiff is ready and willing or able to pay the price to be fixed by arbitrators is not necessary in a bill framed upon the theory that the time for arbitration has passed because the respondent has refused arbitration. Bristol v. Bristol & W. Waterworks (R. I.) 740

6. A complaint for personal injuries, specifying humiliation, injuries to health, etc., as elements of damage, need not designate the particular amount of damage sustained in each particular. Sloane v. Southern California R. Co. (Cal.) 193

7. An allegation that a foreign judgment was "duly adjudged" is sufficient to show jurisdiction and notice to the defendant and the fact that a hearing or trial was had. Fisher v Fielding (Conn.) 236

8. An averment that the plaintiffs well knew that defendant was not indebted to them, and that the only claim they could have was one against a corporation of which he was an officer, is not sufficient to show such fraud as will make a foreign judgment against him reviewable on its merits. Id.

9. An answer to a complaint by trustees of a church, denying that they are trustees and averring that defendants instead are trustees, wherefore judgment is demanded for costs and all proper relief, does not raise an issue as to the legal election of the trustees. Smith v. Pedigo (Ind.) 838

10. An answer that defendant has no knowledge or information upon which to form a belief as to a certain allegation, and therefore denies the same, is not such a specific denial as is required by Mont. Comp. Stat. 1887 (Mont. Code Civ. Proc. § 89). State, Milsted, v. Butte City Water Co. (Mont.) 697

11. An answer should not be stricken from the files if its meaning can be discovered and the facts alleged present a defense. Gregg v. Groesbeck (Utah) 266

12. An answer which is demurrable may be invulnerable when assailed by a motion to strike out. Id.

13. A denial by a corporation for want of sufficient information and belief is insufficient if the matters alleged were presumptively within the knowledge of any of its officers even if the one verifying the answer was without information or belief upon the subject. Sloane v. Southern California R. Co (Cal.) 193

1. A pledge is a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor to be kept by him until the debt is discharged. First Nat. Bank v. Harkness (W. Va.) 408

2. The fact that a pledge is evidenced by writing does not make it necessary to record it. Id.

3. Oil in a tank is effectively pledged by written order to the owner's agent in charge of the oil to hold it to the order of the pledgees as collateral security for a certain sum of money, when such order is accepted by the agent, as this transfers the possession of the oil to the pledgees. Id.

2. An agent is guilty of a fraud which may be repudiated by his principal when without the latter's knowledge he loans his money to his own debtor, receiving a large part of the proceeds in payment of a deed of trust held by him. Dorrah v. Hill (Miss.) 631

3. A description of lots by reference to the streets and the city in which they are located and the name of the owner sufficiently identifies them for the purposes of the statute of frauds requiring a power of attorney to sell lands to be evidenced by a memorandum in writing identifying the property, in connection with evidence that the principal owned no other property in the city. White v. Breen (Ala.) 127

2. The sureties upon the bond of a trustee under an agreement that he shall sell and convert lands to be conveyed to him, as soon as can be conveniently, without sacrifice, invest the money, and pay over the interest, with authority to make public or private sale for cash or on credit, as he may deem best, except that the consent of four persons is required to a private sale,—are released by a subsequent agreement by which the trustee can make no public sale for a year, and no private sale at any time without the consent of seven persons, is deprived of all discretion as to the sales, and by which his duties are changed and his responsibilities increased. Id.

RAILROADS. See also ACTION OR SUIT, 3; COURTS, 1; DAMAGES, 11, 12; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS; NEGLIGENCE, 9; NUISANCES; WRIT AND PROCESS, 2.

1. A railroad company making a flying switch at a crossing which it has kept planked many years between shops of a corporation located on both sides of its road for the use of workmen therein, when it knows that this constitutes practically the only entry to the shops on one side of the track and is used by the workmen in crowds at stated hours of the day, must exercise reasonable care towards them, whether they are to be regarded as licensees or as using the track by invitation. Pomponio v. New York N. H. & H. R. Co. (Conn.) 530

2. One who, in approaching a railroad track, has an unobstructed view of an approaching train, is not relieved from contributory negligence in attempting to cross the track, by the fact that his view becomes obstructed by the smoke from a train going in an opposite direction. Oleson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (Ind.) 149

3. One who attempts to cross a railroad track immediately after the passage of a train whose smoke obscures the view in the opposite direction, but is rapidly being carried away by the wind, is guilty of contributory negligence in not waiting until the view becomes clear. Id.

4. The duty of trainmen to avoid injury to animals on the track must be exercised consistently with the paramount duty to passengers on the train. Kirk v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (W. Va.) 416

5. At least ordinary care must be used to avoid unnecessary injury to animals found in the way of a train on a railroad track which is unenclosed, where animals are allowed to run at large. Id.

6. The use of salt on railroad switches, when it is the only effective means of freeing them from ice and thus protecting passengers and employees from the danger of a wreck, although it may have a tendency to lure livestock to the track, will not render the railroad company liable for such stock killed by a train, in the absence of negligence in running the train. Kirk v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (W. Va.) 416

7. The fact that overflows of surface water and water from a river and streams upon low land are somewhat deepened and somewhat more prolonged when they occur, on account of the construction of a railroad embankment, with large and numerous trestles to provide for the passage of the water, does not make the railroad company liable where there is nothing to show that trestles in lieu of the embankment would be as economical or make as safe and proper a roadway. *Yazoo & M. 2. Carpet manufacturers have a right to some record or register of recipes prepared by a color mixer in their employ, where, instead of entering them in their color book as it was his duty to do, he has without their knowledge entered them in a book of his own. Id.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES. See also ACTION OR SUIT, 5, 9.

1. The presumption of the incorporation of a religious society made by How. (Mich.) Stat. § 4649, when it has exercised the franchises and privileges of a corporation for ten successive years is not conclusive and does not apply when the powers conferred by statute upon the corporators are by the laws of the church lodged in another body. Fuchs v. Meisel (Mich.) 92

2. That no trust or title in or to property ever vested in the general denomination is not a sufficient answer to a bill by individuals to establish a right to the use of the property under the discipline and usages of the church to which it was conveyed. Id.

3. Courts are not deprived of jurisdiction to enforce rights in the property of a voluntary religious association, which have been established by a conclusive ecclesiastical decree, where there is no other remedy, by a statute providing that no order of any ecclesiastical body, or any custom or usuage of any religious order, shall hereafter be recognized or enforced in this state so far as it shall relate to the acquisition, tenure, control, or disposition of any real estate or interest therein. Id.

4. The trustees and a majority of the members of a religious association which voluntarily connected itself with a particular denomination and acquired property in such connection cannot withdraw such property from its connection with the denomination against the protest of the minority, or prevent its use by persons remaining in the denomination and representing its regular organization. Id.

5. The majority of a church which has abandoned the religious faith on which the church was founded cannot hold the church property against the minority which adheres to the original doctrines. Smith v. Pedigo (Ind.) 838

6. The excommunication by a majority faction of a church, of the minority members, who still adhere to the original faith and claim to be the church, cannot affect the rights of the minority to the church property. Id.

7. The minority members of a church acting in harmony with its ecclesiastical laws and adhering to the faith constitute the church as against a majority which has departed from the faith. Id.

8. The "means" doctrine, to the effect that conversions and salvation may be aided by the use of human means, is a departure from the faith of a "regular Baptist church," which is strongly Calvinistic. Id.

2. A seller of a chattel by conditional sale reserving the power to take possession upon default, who also receives a judgment bond as collateral security, cannot enforce such bond after he has rescinded the sale by taking possession of the chattel. Seanor v. McLaughlin (Pa.) 467

1. A statute reconstructing or reforming an existing board of revenue is not invalid because its title is "An Act to Establish a Board of Revenue." State, Bragg, v. Rogers (Ala.) 520

2. A statute original in form and in itself intelligible and complete, although in some respects it modifies and changes existing statutes which are not recited at length, does not violate a constitutional provision against reviving or amending a law without re-enacting or publishing it at length. Id.

3. The elimination of a provision giving a right of appeal to resident owners only from a statute providing for annexation may be made if that provision is unconstitutional, without destroying the whole statute. Taggart v. Claypole (Ind.) 586

4. An enrolled bill signed by the governor and by the presiding officer of each of the two Houses of the legislature cannot be impeached by reference to the journals of either House, to show that a vote thereon was not taken by the yeas and nays and entered in the journal as required by the Constitution. Lafferty v. Huffman (Ky.) 203

STREET RAILWAYS. See also CARRIERS, 5, 6; NEGLIGENCE, 8; PUBLIC MONEY.

1. Evidence that the use of salt is necessary to make it possible to run street cars at a low place in which the water gathers during the day and freezes at night is not sufficient to show that an ordinance prohibiting the use of salt is unreasonable, where it does not appear that at reasonable expense the water cannot be diverted from the tracks. State, Consolidated Traction Co. v. Elizabeth (N. J. Sup.) 170

2. An ordinance prohibiting the use of salt on a street-railway track except on curves at street corners is not invalid as an impairment of the franchise of a street-railway company or a restriction of the operation of its road, merely because it will occasion inconvenience or involve expense or prevent the company from operating its road so successfully. Id.

3. The unreasonable overloading of a street car and its unlawful speed, which make it impossible to stop the car as soon as may be necessary to avert a collision, are gross negligence which renders the street railway company liable for a resulting accident. Richmond R. & E. Co. v. Carthright (Va.) 220

4. A person crossing a street-railway track at a street crossing is not guilty of negligence per se in omitting to look in both directions for the approach of a car. Cincinnati Street R. Co. v. Snell (Ohio) 276

5. A person about to cross the track of a street railway at a street crossing must exercise care proportioned to the danger to be avoided and the consequences which may result from want of it, according to the particular circumstances surrounding him, but only such care as may reasonably be expected of persons of ordinary prudence. Id.

6. The introduction of new forms of vehicles and of new motive power in street railways has not impaired the right of foot passengers to safe passage at street crossings; but the speed of cars must be so regulated and such warning given of their approach, at whatever cost of pains and trouble, that the footman using ordinary care may, in the absence of unavoidable accident, cross in safety. Id.

2. The right to extend a subway upon the Public Garden in Boston under Mass. Stat. 1894, chap. 548, to that extent modifies Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 54, § 13, restricting highways, street railways, etc., on public commons or parks. Id.

1. A state tax levied on the succession by foreign heirs, legatees, or donees to property of a deceased person, is inoperative as to a citizen and subject of Italy, who by treaty is entitled to the same right to acquire property in this country that our citizens have. Re Rixner's Succession (La.) 177

2. A tax on credits in the hands of resident trustees holding the absolute legal title thereto in trust for nonresidents of the state is within the power of the legislature to impose. Detroit v. Lewis (Mich.) 439

3. "Inhabitants" of a state, whose credits of every kind are taxed by Mich. Pub. Acts 1893, No. 206, include resident trustees holding the absolute legal title to choses in action for the benefit of nonresidents. Id.

4. An express exemption of the shares of a corporation from taxation, nothing else appearing, will also exempt the company itself from taxation. State, Singer Mfg. Co. v. Heppenheimer (N. J. Err. & App.) 643

5. A franchise tax laid on the capital of a corporation less the value of its personal and real property in the state violates a charter exemption of its real and personal property "not actually and in fact within the state, . . . and the stock . . . held or owned by any of its stockholders." Id.

6. TRIAL.

1. Dismissing a suit on a demurrer to evidence which, with all legitimate inferences therefrom, makes out no cause of action is not a violation of the constitutional guaranty of the right to trial by jury, or of a provision that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact. Hopkins v. Nashville C. & St. L. R. Co. (Tenn.) 354

2. The practice of demurring to evidence, although cumbersome and antiquated, may be sustained when no liability is established against the defendant upon the facts or legitimate inferences therefrom. Id.

3. On demurrer to evidence the other party will be required to join therein, unless the case be plainly against the demurrant and his object in demurring is clearly nothing but delay. Mapel v. John (W. Va.) 800

4. Filing indictments against witnesses to prove an alibi, based solely on evidence of witnesses for the prosecution, in the presence of persons summoned to serve as jurors in the trial of the case, is improper as not calculated to give the accused a fair and impartial trial. Atkins v. Com. (Ky.) 108

5. A general verdict of guilty not fixing the value of the property, under an indictment charging burglary and larceny in the same count, is a conviction of burglary, as a conviction for larceny must find the value of the property stolen. Love v. People (Ill.) 139

9. The mere fact that a woman injured by being dragged by a street car on which her clothing was caught testified that she should think the bolt on which her clothing caught had no part in throwing her down, aside from the jerking of the car, will not require the exclusion from the jury of the question as to negligence in the position of the bolt, since the jury from all the circumstances may decide that the bolt was, without her knowledge, the cause of the accident. Tunnicliffe v. Bay Cities Consol. R. Co. (Mich.) 142

10. Instructing the jury to find for plaintiff or for defendant in case they find the existence of certain enumerated facts which are within the issues, on which evidence has been given, does not violate a constitutional provision against charging with respect to matters of fact. Ryan v. Los Angeles Ice & C. S. Co. (Cal.) 524

An agreement between the devisees of lands, providing for the selection of a trustee by the parties or an appointment by the judge, and that the lands shall be transferred to such trustee by a proper and suitable conveyance to hold a portion thereof for the benefit of the sisters of such devisees, with remainder to their children no consideration moving from such children, is both voluntary and executory,—especially where by its terms it is impossible to tell what lands will go into the trust estate. Id.

6. A voluntary settlement in trust providing that it shall take effect by conveyance will not be held to operate as a declaration of trust. Id.

7. An agreement between devisees of land to convey a portion thereof to a trustee to be appointed, for the benefit of their sisters for life with remainder to the latter's children, cannot be considered as creating a trust for the benefit of the remaindermen on the ground that it creates the relation of vendor and purchaser, and that in equity vendors are trustees of the land for the purchasers, where there is no consideration as between such remaindermen and the signers of the agreement. Id.

8. The failure to perform a promise made by the sole beneficiary of a will to the testator, to comply with his request, contained in a letter, that a portion of the property should be used to aid certain other persons, is not such a fraud as will create a trust ex maleficio. Orth v. Orth (Ind.) 298

9. A letter to testator's wife containing advice as to the management of the estate, and expressing a hope that she will convey certain property to a person named, and that she will have sufficient after paying debts to assist all his children as they may need from time to time, and expressing full confidence that she will act justly toward all, closing with a desire that she will have a competence during life, and then what is left give to all the children alike,—does not create any interest in the property in favor of the children, or impose any burden upon the absolute title which is given to her by the will. Id.

Under a statute allowing 8 per cent interest, a loan of $850 for the term of 40 years is not rendered usurious by giving a bond for $1,000 at 6 per cent per annum payable semi-annually, although it bears date 39 days before the money is received by the borrower, and although it is stipulated that after 90 days' default upon any instalment of interest the whole of the principal shall become due and payable, where it is not stipulated that in this event the lender shall not account for interest received over and above 8 per cent per annum on the loan actually made, and there is no devise to cover up usury, or intent to make default before the full term expired. McTighe v. *Macon Constr. 3. A ballot containing two names, with the words "long term" after one of them, cast at an election which is held only for the election of school directors, one for a long term and one to fill a vacancy, can be counted at least for the person named for the long term, although there is a failure to designate by express words the office for which the other person was named. Id.

4. The designation of the office to be filled, which a ballot must show under 1 Starr & C. (Ill.) Stat. p. 1008, §§ 52, 53, sufficiently appears at least as to the person named for the long term—upon a ballot containing the names of two persons, with the words "long term" following one name, without any other words to designate the office, when the election is held only for school directors, one to be chosen for a long term and one for a vacancy. Id.

6. The requirements of Dak. Comp. Laws, § 565, that if the county board orders an election on a proposition to relocate the county-seat it shall be its duty to notify the voters in the general election notices to designate upon their ballot at the election the place of their choice, is substantially complied with by a notice stating that one of the purposes of the election is to vote upon the question of relocating the county-seat. Id.

5. The altitude of the land of a riparian proprietor, which makes it impossible to irrigate it solely by natural gravitation from the stream with the aid of ditches and dams thereon which will not back the water on lands of other persons, will not defeat his right to a just and equal proportion of the water for irrigating purposes. Id.

6. The apportionment of the flow of a stream by periods of time, rather than by a division of its quantity, so that upper and lower proprietors may each have the full flow for designated periods, instead of a portion of the flow all the time, which equity may order when the absorption and evaporation of the water would prevent any from reaching the lower proprietor if the flow was divided, may be valid as to water used for domestic purposes as well as that used for irrigation. Wiggins v. Muscupiabe Land & W. Co. (Cal.) 667

7. A land owner who discharges a large body of surface water contrary to the natural course of drainage, by ditches leading into and along a highway to a ravine, through which it flows across the land of another person who is injured thereby, is liable for the damages, when he could, as effectively and conveniently, have drained the water into the ravine on his own premises, in the first instance, at a point below the premises of the other party. Jacobson v. Van Boening (Neb.) 229

8. The refusal of a water company to supply water to a tenant in the possession and occupancy of a house, when he is ready to pay for it in advance and the company is supplying a city and its inhabitants under a franchise, cannot be justified by a by-law declining to contract for water with any persons except owners of property or their authorized agents. State, Milsted, v. Butte City Water Co. (Mont.) 697
